TO MY DAUGHTERS,

This Volume is Dedicated

P R E F A C E.

THE object of this Handbook is to supply readers and speakers with a lucid, but very brief account of such names as are used in allusions and references, whether by poets or prose writers,—to furnish those who consult it with the plot of popular dramas, the story of epic poems, and the outline of well-known tales. Who has not asked what such and such a book is about? and who would not be glad to have his question answered correctly in a few words? When the title of a play is mentioned, who has not felt a desire to know who was the author of it?—for it seems a universal practice to allude to the title of dramas without stating the author. And when reference is made to some character, who has not wished to know something specific about the person referred to? The object of this Handbook is to supply these wants. Thus, it gives in a few lines the story of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, of Virgil's Æneid, Lucan's Pharsalia, and the Thebaid of Statius, of Dante's Divine Comedy, Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, and Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, of Milton's Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained, of Thomson's Seasons, of Ossian's tales, the Nibelungen Lied of the German minnesingers, the Romance of the Rose, the Lusiad of Camoens, the Loves of Theagènes and Charicleia by Heliodorus (fourth century), with the several story poems of Chaucer, Gower, Piers Plowman, Hawes, Spenser, Drayton, Phineas Fletcher, Prior, Goldsmith, Campbell, Southey, Byron, Scott, Moore, Tennyson, Longfellow, and so on. Far from limiting its scope to poets, the Handbook tells, with similar brevity, the stories of our national fairy tales and romances, such novels as those by Charles Dickens, Vanity Fair by Thackeray, the Rasselas of Johnson, Gulliver's Travels by Swift, the Sentimental Journey by Sterne, Don Quixote and Gil Blas, Telemachus by Fénelon, and Undine by De la Motte Fouqué. Great pains have been taken with the Arthurian stories, whether from sir T. Malory's collection or from the Mabinogion, because Tennyson has brought them to the front in his Idylls of the King, and the number of dramatic plots sketched out is many hundreds

Another striking and interesting feature of the book is the revelation of the source from which dramatists and romancers have derived their stories, and the strange repetitions of historic incidents. Compare, for example, the stratagem of the wooden horse by which Troy was taken, with those of Abu Oberdah in the siege of Arristan, and that of the capture of Sark from the French, p 454. Compare, again, Dido's cutting the hide into strips, with the story about the Yakutsks, p 164, that of Romulus and Remus, with the story of Tyro, p 843, the Shibboleth of Scripture story, with those of the "Sicilian Vespers," and of the Danes on St Bryce's Day, p 904, the story of Pisistratos and his two sons, with that of Cosmo de Medici and his two grandsons, p 771, the death of Marcus Licinius Crassus, with that of Manlius Nepos Aquilius, p 392, and the famous "Douglas larder," with the larder of Wallace at Ardrossan, p 269. Witness the numerous tales resembling that of William Tell and the apple, p 980, of the Pied Piper of Hamelin, p 766, of Llewellyn and his dog Gelert, p 369, of bishop Hatto and the rats, p 429, of Ulysses and Polyphemos, p 1050, and of lord Lovel's bride, p 571. Witness, again, the parallelisms of David in his flight from Saul, and that of Mahomet from the Koreishites, p 937, of Jephtha and his daughter, and the tale of Idomenus of Crete, or that of Agamemnon and Iphigenia, p 491, of Paris and Sextus, p 895, Salome and Fulvia, p 864, St Patrick preaching to king O'Neil, and St Arced before the king of Abyssinia, p 738, of Cleopatra and Sophonisba, with scores of others.

To ensure accuracy, every work alluded to in this large volume has been read personally by the author expressly for this Handbook, and since the compilation was commenced, for although, at the beginning, a few others were employed for the sake of despatch, the author read over for himself, while the sheets were passing through the press, the works put into their hands. The very minute references to words and phrases, book and chapter, act and scene, often to page and line, will be sufficient guarantee to the reader that this assertion is not overstated.

The work is in a measure novel, and cannot fail to be useful. It is owned that Charles Lamb has told, and told well, the Tales of Shakespeare, but Charles Lamb has occupied more pages with each tale than the Handbook has lines. It is also true that an "Argument" is generally attached to each book of an epic story, but the reading of these rhapsodies is like reading an index—few have patience to wade through them, and fewer still obtain therefrom any clear idea of the spirit of the actors, or the progress of the story. Brevity has been the aim of this Handbook, but clearness has not been sacrificed to terseness, and it has been borne in mind throughout that it is not enough to state a fact,—it must be stated attractively, and the character described must be drawn characteristically, if the reader is to appreciate it, and feel an interest in what he reads

Three APPENDICES are added. The first contains the name, birthplace, dates of birth and death, and a pretty full list of works (first editions, dated) of our principal authors. In this appendix an effort has been made, by correspondence with publishers and authors, and by the help of books, to present almost an exhaustive list of the popular literature and paintings of the second half of the present century. Appendix II contains the names and works of those foreign authors referred to in the Handbook. Appendix III contains the names and dates of the ancient Greek and Latin plays, with those of the best known translations and imitations, the names and dates of those French and German dramas which have been adapted to the English stage, or have been borrowed from our own dramatists, and the titles, names, and dates of some thousands of British plays. When the exact date of the first representation or edition of a play has not been ascertained, the dates of the birth and death of the author are given, except in the case of living authors, when the century of the "unknown date" has been substituted instead. More than twelve months of undivided labour have been given to these appendices.

It would be most unjust to conclude this preface without publicly acknowledging the great obligation which the author owes to the printer's reader while the sheets were passing through the press. He seems to have entered into the very spirit of the book, his judgment has been sound, his queries have been intelligent, his suggestions invaluable, and even some of the articles were supplied by him.

THE AUTHOR

Those verses introduced but not signed or signed with initials only, are by the author of the Handbook. They are the Stornello Verses, p. 918, the aspen tree (an epigram), p. 1025, Nones and Ides, p. 689, the Seven Wise Men, p. 891, the Seven Wonders of the World, p. 894, and the following translations.—Lucan's "Serpents," p. 759. "Veni Wakefield peramanum," p. 373, specimen of ΤΥΡΑΝΟΣ p. 1047. "Vos non vobis," p. 1075, "Rol d'ivrot," p. 1126, "Non amo te" p. 1126, Marot's epigram p. 569, epigram on a violin, p. 1070, epigram on the Fair Rosamond, p. 844, the Heidelberg tun, p. 1040, "Poger Bontemps," p. 839, "Le bon roi Dagobert," p. 618, "Pauvre Jacques," p. 741, Virgil's epitaph, p. 1070, "Cunctis mare," p. 874, "Ni fallit fatum," p. 870, St. Elmo, p. 859, Baviad, etc., pp. 85, 591, several oracular responses (see PROMPT, p. 795, WOODEN WALLS, p. 1117, etc.), and many others. The chief object of this book is to prevent any useless search after these trifles.

THE READER'S HANDBOOK.

AARON, a Moor, beloved by Tamora, queen of the Goths, in the tragedy of Titus Andronicus, published amongst the plays of Shakespeare (1593)

(The classic name is Andronicus, but the character of this play is purely fictitious.)

Aaron (St), a British martyr of the City of Legions (Newport, in South Wales) He was torn limb from limb by order of Maximianus Herculus, general in Britain, of the army of Diocletian. Two churches were founded in the City of Legions one in honour of St Aaron and one in honour of his fellow-martyr, St Julius. Newport was called Caerleon by the British.

two of them sealed their doctrine with their blood
 Sam. John and with him Sam. I can have their room
 At Carson suffering death by bloodstain and son
 Drayton / London 1816

Aaz'iz (3 syl), so the queen of Sheba or Sabra is sometimes called, but in the Koran she is called Balkis (ch. xxvii).

Abad'don an angel of the bottomless pit (Rev ix. 11) The word is derived from the Hebrew, abad, "lost," and means the lost one. There are two other angels introduced by Klopstock in The Messiah with similar names, but must not be confounded with the angel referred to in Rev, one is Obradlon, the angel of death, and the other Abbad'ona, the repentant devil.

Ab'aris, to whom Apollo gave a golden arrow, on which to ride through the air—See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable.

Abbad'ona, once the friend of Abdiel, was drawn into the rebellion of Satan half unwillingly. In hell he constantly bewailed his fall, and reproved Satan for his pride and blasphemy. He openly declared to the infernals that he would take no part or lot in Satan's scheme for the death of the Messiah, and during the crucifixion lingered about the cross with repentance, hope, and fear. His ultimate fate we are not told, but when Satan and Adramelech are driven back to hell, Obaddon, the angel of death, says—

For thee Abaddon I have no orders. How long thou art permitted to remain on earth I know not nor whether thou wilt be allowed to see the re-creation of the Lord of glory. But be not deceived thou canst not see Him with the joy of the redeemed. Yet let me see Him let me see Him!"—Hlopstock The Messiah xlii

Abberville (Lord), a young nobleman, 23 years of age, who has for travelling tutor a Welshman of 6, called Dr Druid, an antiquary, wholly ignorant of his real duties as a guide of youth. The young man runs wantonly wild, squanders his money, and gives loose to his passions almost to the verge of ruin, but he is arrested and reclaimed by his honest Scotch bailiff or financier, and the vigilance of his father's executor, Mr Mortimer. This "fashionable lover" proposes marriage to a vulgar, malicious city miss named Lucinda Bridgemore, but is saved from this pitfall also—Cumber-land, The Fashionable Lover (1780)

Abdal-aziz, the Moorish governor of Spain after the overthrow of king Roderick. When the Moor assumed regal state and asserted Gothic sovereignty, his subjects were so offended that they revolted and murdered him. He married I Gilona, formerly the wife of Roderick — Southey, Poetical, etc., xxi (1811)

rased to "Mahomet's bosom" in reward of his great abstinence and self-denial —
Herbelot, 690

He was by no means scrupulous nor did he think with the caliph Omar ben Alkhattab that it was necessary to make a hell of this world to enjoy paradise in the next — W. H. Ford Letter (1786)

Abdal'dar, one of the magicians in the Doudaniel caverns, "under the roots of the ocean." These spirits were destined to be destroyed by one of the race of Hoder'rah (3 syl'), so they persecuted the race even to death. Only one survived, named Thal'aba, and Abdal'dar was appointed by lot to find him out and kill him. He discovered the stripling in an Arab's tent and while in prayer was about to stab him to the heart with a dagger, when the angel of death breathed on him, and he fell dead with the dagger in his hand. Thal'aba drew from the magician's finger a ring which gave him command over the spirits — Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer, ii iii (1797).

Abdal'tah, brother and predecessor of Gialfir (2 syl'), pacha of Aby'dos. He was murdered by the pacha — Byron, Bride of Abydos.

Abdal'tah el Hadgi, Saladin's envoy — Sir W Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I).

Abdals or Santons, a class of religionists who pretend to be inspired with the most ravishing raptures of divine love. Regarded with great veneration by the vulgar — Olearius, i 971.

Abde'rian Laughter, scoffing laughter, so called from Abd'ra, the birthplace of Democritus, the scoffing or laughing philosopher.

Ab'diel, the faithful seraph who withstood Satan when he urged those under him to revolt.

the seraph Abdiel faithful found Among the faithless faithful only he Among innumerable false unmoved
Unshaken unswerving untrifled
His loyalty he kept his love his zeal.
Milton Paradise Lost v 896 etc. (1663)

Abensberg (Count), the father of thirty-two children. When Heinrich II made his progress through Germany, and other courtiers presented their offerings, the count brought forward his thirty-two children, "as the most valuable offering he could make to his king and country."

Abes'sa, the impersonation of abbeys and convents in Spenser's Fairy Queen, 8. She is the paramour of Kirk-ripping, who used to rob churches and poor boxes, and bring his plunder to Abessan, daughter of Corecea (Blindness of Heart).

Abney, called Young Abney, the friend of colonel Albert Lee, a royalist — Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, the Commonwealth).

Abon Hassan, a young merchant of Bagdad, and hero of the tale called "The Sleeper Awakened," in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. While Abon Hassan is asleep he is conveyed to the palace of Haroun-al-Raschid, and the attendants are ordered to do everything they can to make him fancy himself the caliph. He subsequently becomes the caliph's chief favourite.

Shakespeare, in the induction of Taming of the Shrew, befools "Christopher Sly" in a similar way, but Sly thinks it was "nothing but a dream."

Philippe le Bon, duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Isabella, tried the same trick — Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, ii 2, 4.

Abra, the most beloved of Solomon's concubines.

Fruits their odour lost and meats their taste

From her to Adam's house was sent

Nor could my soul approve the music's tone
Till all was hushed and Abra sang alone

M. Prior Solomon (1664-1721).

Ab'radas, the great Macedonian pirate.

Ab'radas the great Macedonian pirate thought every one had a letter of merit that bare sailes in the ocean — Greene Penelope's Web (1601).

Ab'raham's Offering (Gen xxi) Abraham at the command of God laid his only son Isaac upon an altar to sacrifice him to Jehovah, when his hand was stayed and a ram substituted for Isaac.

So Agamemnon at Aulis was about to offer up his daughter Iphigenia at the command of Artemis (Diana), when Artemis carried her off in a cloud and substituted a stag instead.

Abroc'omas, the lover of An'tibia in the Greek romance of Ephesiaca, by Xenophon of Ephesus (not the historian).

Ab'salom, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for the duke of Monmouth, natural son of Charles II (David). Like Absalom, the duke was handsome, like Absalom, he was loved and rebellious, and like Absalom, his rebellion ended in his death (1649-1685).

Ab'solon, a priggish parish clerk in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. His hair was curled, his shoes slashed, his hose red. He could let blood, cut hair, and shave, could dance, and play either on the ribble or the gittern. This gay spark paid his addresses to Mistress Alison, the young wife of John, a rich but aged carpenter, but Alison herself loved a poor scholar named Nicholas, a lodger in the house — The Miller's Tale (1388)

Absolute (Sir Anthony), a testy, but warm-hearted old gentleman, who imagines that he possesses a most angelic temper, and when he quarrels with his son, the captain fancies it is the son who is out of temper, and not himself. Smollett's "Matthew Bramble" evidently suggested this character. William Dowton (1764-1851) was the best actor of this part.

Captain Absolute, son of Sir Anthony, in love with Lydia Languish, the heiress, to whom he is known only as ensign Beverley. Bob Acres, his neighbour, is his rival, and sends a challenge to the unknown ensign, but when he finds that ensign Beverley is Captain Absolute, he declines to fight, and resigns all further claim to the lady's hand — Sheridan, The Rivals (1775).

When you saw Jack Palmers in "captain Absolute" you thought you could trace his promotion to some lady of quality who fawned the handsome fellow in his top knot and had bought him a commission — Charles Lamb.

Abu'dah, in the Tales of the Genii, by H. Ridley, is a wealthy merchant of Bagdad, who goes in quest of the talisman of Orom'nès, which he is driven to seek by a little old hag, who haunts him every night and makes his life wretched. He finds at last that the talisman which is to free him of this hag [conscience] is to "fear God and keep His commandments."

Abu'dah, in the drama called The Siege of Damascus, by John Hughes (1720), is the next in command to Calad in the Arabian army set down before Damascus. Though undoubtedly brave, he prefers peace to war, and when, at the death of Calad, he succeeds to the chief command, he makes peace with the Syrians on honourable terms.

Acadē'mus, an Attic hero, whose garden was selected by Plato for the place of his lectures. Hence his disciples were called the "Academic sect."

The green retreats of Academus
Aken. Idle Treasures of Imagination 1

Acadia (i.e. Nova Scotia), so called by the French from the river [Shuben-acadie]. In 1621 Acadia was given to Sir William Alexander, and its name changed, and in 1755 the old French settlers were driven into exile by George II. Longfellow has made this the subject of a poem in hexameter verse, called Evangeline (1 syl.)

Acas'to (Lord), father of Serino, Castalio, and Polydore, and guardian of Monimia "the orphan." He lived to see the death of his sons and his ward. Polydore ran on his brother's sword, Castalio stabbed himself, and Monimia took poison — Otway, The Orphan (1680).

Accidente (3 syl.), a curse and oath used much in Italy.

Accidente! ce qui veut dire en bon français. Pâlez tu mourir d'accident sans confes ton damné — Mons About, Tolla (a tale).

Aces'tes (3 syl.) In a trial of skill Aestes, the Scythian, discharged his arrow with such force that it took fire from the friction of the air — Virgil, Æneid, 1.

Like Aestes' shaft of old
The swift thought kindles as it flies.
Longfellow. To a Child

Achates [A-I-a'-tez], called by Virgil "fidus Achates." The name has become a synonym for a bosom friend, a crony, but is generally used laughingly — Æneid.

He like Achate faithful to the tomb
Byron. Don Juan, l. 120

Acher'ia, the fox, went partnership with a bear in a bowl of milk. Before the bear arrived, the fox skimmed off the cream and drank the milk, then, filling the bowl with mud, replaced the cream atop. Says the fox, "Here is the bowl, one shall have the cream, and the other all the rest choose, friend, which you like." The bear told the fox to take the cream, and thus bribe had only the mud — A Basque Tale.

A similar tale occurs in Campbell's Popular Tales of the West Highlands (in 98), called "The Keg of Butter." The wolf chooses the bottom when "oats" were the object of choice, and the top when "potatoes" were the sowing.

Rabelais tells the same tale about a farmer and the devil. Each was to have on alternate years what grew under and over the soil. The farmer sowed turnips and carrots when the under-soil produce came to his lot, and barley or wheat when his turn was the over-soil produce.

Ac'heron, the "River of Grief," and one of the five rivers of hell, hell itself (Greek, áyox pów, "I flow with grief").

Bad Acheron of sorrow black and deep
Milton, Paradise Lost, ll. 578 (1655).

Achilles (3 syl.), the hero of the allied Greek army in the siege of Troy, and king of the Myrmidons — See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

The English Achilles, John Talbot, first earl of Shrewsbury (1373-1453)

The duke of Wellington is so called sometimes, and is represented by a statue of Achilles of gigantic size in Hyde Park, London, close to Apsley House (1769-1852)

The Achilles of Germany, Albert, elector of Brandenburg (1414-1486)

Achilles of Rome, Sennius Denta'tus (put to death B.C. 450)

Achilles' Heel, the vulnerable part. It is said that when Thetis dipped her son in the river Styx to make him invulnerable, she held him by the heel, and the part covered by her hand was the only part not washed by the water. This is a post-Homeric story.

(Hanover) is the Achilles heel to invulnerable England — Carlyle

(Sometimes Ireland is called the Achilles' heel of England)

Similarly, the only vulnerable part of Orlando was the sole of his foot, and hence when Bernardo del Carpio assailed him at Roncesvalles, and found that he could not wound him, he lifted him up in his arms and squeezed him to death, as Hercules did Antæos.

Achilles' Spear. Telephus tried to stop the march of the Greek army on its way to Troy, and received a wound from Achilles. The oracle told him that "Achilles gave the wound, only Achilles could cure it." Whereupon Telephus went to the tent of the hero, and was cured, some say by a herb called "Achilles," and others say by an empiastrium of rust scraped from the spear. Hence it was said that "Achilles' spear could both hurt and heal" — Plin. xxv. 5.

Whose smile and frown like to Achilles' spear
Is able with the change to kill or cure
Shakespeare — Henry V act i. sc. 1 (1591)

Achitophel, "Him who drew Achitophel," Dryden, author of the famous political satire of Absalom and Achitophel. "David" is Charles II, his rebellious son "Absalom" is the king's natural son, the handsome but rebellious James duke of Monmouth, and "Achitophel," the traitorous counsellor, is the earl of Shaftesbury, "for close designs and crooked counsels fit."

Can sneer at him who drew Achitophel
Byron Don Juan lll. 100

There is a portrait of the first earl of Shaftesbury (Dryden's Achitophel) as lord chancellor of England clad in ash coloured robes because he had never been called to the bar — E. Yates, Celebrities xviii.

Acidalia, a fountain in Bœotia, sacred to Venus. The Græces used to bathe therein. Venus was called Acidāha (Virgil, Æneid, i. 720).

After she weary was
With bathing in the Acidalian brook
Spenser Flythamilton (1535)

Æcis, a Sicilian shepherd, loved by the nymph Galatæa. The monster Polypheme (3 syl), a Cyclops, was his rival, and crushed him under a huge rock. The blood of Æcis was changed into a river of the same name at the foot of mount Etna.

Not such a pipe good reader as that which Æcis did Sweetly tune in praise of his Galatæa but one of true
Delft manufacture — N. Irving

Æckland (Sir Thomas), a royalist — Sir W. Scott, Woodstock (time, the Commonwealth).

Æcoe (3 syl), "hearing," in the New Testament sense (Rom. v. 17), "Faith cometh by hearing." The nurse of Ido [faith]. Her daughter is Meditation (Greek, aiðē, "hearing").

With him [faith] his nurse went careful Æcoe Whose hands first from his mother's womb did take him
And ever since have fostered tenderly
John Fletcher The Fair Isle ix. (1633)

Æcras'ia, Intemperance personified. Spenser says she is an enchantress living in the "Bower of Bhs," in "Wandering Island." She had the power of transforming her lovers into monstrous shapes, but Sir Guyon (temperance), having caught her in a net and bound her, broke down her bower and burnt it to ashes — Fairy Queen, ii. 12 (1590).

Æciates (3 syl), Incontinence personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher. He had two sons (twins) by Cirro, viz., Methos (diuineness) and Gluttony, both fully described in canto vii (Greek, akates, "incontinent").

Æciates (3 syl), Incontinence personified in The Fairy Queen, by Spenser. He is the father of Cymochæles and Pyrochæles — Bk. ii. 4 (1590).

Acres (Bob), a country gentleman, the rival of Esign Beverley, alias captain Absolute, for the hand and heart of Lydia Langwush, the heiress. He tries to ape the man of fashion, gets himself up as a loud swell, and uses "sentimental oaths," i.e. oaths bearing on the subject. Thus if duels are spoken of he says, ods triggers and fints, if clothes, ods frogs and ram-bours, if music, ods minnims [minims] and ci otchets if ladies, ods blushe and blooms.

This he learnt from a militia officer, who told him the ancients swore by Jove, Bacchus, Mars, Venus, Minerva, etc., according to the sentiment Bob Acres is a great blusterer, and talks big of his daring, but when put to the push "his courage always oozed out of his fingers' ends." J Quick was the original Bob Acres — Sheridan, The Rivals (1775)

As thro his palms Bob Acres valour oozed
So Juan's virtue ebbed I know not how Byron Don Juan

Acris'ius, father of Dan'ê An oracle declared that Danaë would give birth to a son who would kill him, so Acrisius kept his daughter shut up in an apartment under ground, or (as some say) in a brzen tower Here she became the mother of Per'seus (2 syl), by Jupiter in the form of a shower of gold The king of Argos now ordered his daughter and her infant to be put into a chest, and cast adrift on the sea, but they were rescued by Dictys, a fisherman When grown to manhood, Perseus accidentally struck the foot of Acrisius with a quoit, and the blow caused his death This tale is told by Mr Morris in The Earthly Paradise (April)

Acte'on, a hunter, changed by Diana into a stag A synonym for a cuckold

Divulge Pass' himself for a secure and wilful Acteon [cuckold]
Shakespeare Merry Wives etc. act III sc. 2 (1795)

Acte'a, a female slave faithful to Nero in his fall It was this hetæra who wrapped the dead body in ceremonies, and saw it decently interred

This Acte'a was beautiful. She was scolded on the ground the head of Nero was on her lap his naked body was treched on those winding sheets in which she was about to fold him to lay him in his grave upon the garden hill — Ovid, Ariadne 17

Ac'tus Since'rus, the nom de plume of the Italian poet Saunazaro, called "The Christian Virgil" (1158-1530)

Actors and Actresses The last male actor that took a woman's character on the stage was Edward Kynaston, noted for his beauty (1619-1687) The first female actor for hire was Mrs Saunderson, afterwards Mrs Betterton, who died in 1712

Ad, Ad'ites (2 syl) Ad is a tribe descended from Ad, son of Uz, son of Irem, son of Shem, son of Noah The tribe, at the Confusion of Babel, went and settled on Al-Ahkâf [the Winding Sands], in the province of Hadramaut, Shedad was their first king, but in consequence of his pride, both he and all the tribe perished, either from drought or the Sarsar (an icy wind) — Sale's Koran, 1.

Woe woe to Irem! Woe to Ad!

Southery Thalaba the Destroyer L 41 45 (1787)

A'dah, wife of Cain After Cain had been conducted by Lucifer through the realms of space, he is restored to the home of his wife and child, where all is beauty, gentleness, and love Full of faith and fervent in gratitude, Adah loves her infant with a sublime maternal affection She sees him sleeping, and says to Cain—

How lovely he appears! His little cheeks
In their pure incarnation vying with
The rose-leaves strewn beneath them
And his lips too
How beautifully parted! No, you shall not kiss him, at least not now He will awake soon—
His hour of midday rest is nearly over Byron Cain

Adam In Grec this word is compounded of the four initial letters of the cardinal quarters

Arktos,	ἀρκτος	north
Dusis,	δυσς	west
Anatolê,	ἀνατολή	east
Mesembria,	μεσημβρία	south

The Hebrew word ADM forms the anagram of A[dam], D[avid], M[essiah]

Adam, how made God created the body of Adam of Silzal, i.e. dry, unbaked clay, and left it forty nights without a soul The clay was collected by Azrael from the four quarters of the earth, and God, to show His approval of Azrael's choice, constituted him the angel of death — Rabbadan

Adam, Lie, and the Serpent After the fall Adam was placed on mount Vasseem in the east, Lie was banished to Djidda (now Gedda, on the Arabian coast), and the Serpent was exiled to the coast of Iblehl

After the lapse of 100 years Adam rejoined Eve on mount Araratli [place of Remembrance], near Mecca — D Ohsson
Death of Adam Adam died on Friday, April 7, at the age of 930 years Michael swathed his body and Gabriel discharged the funeral rites The body was buried at Ghar ul-Kenz [the grotto of treasure], which overlooks Mecca

His descendants at death amounted to 40,000 souls — D Ohsson

When Noah entered the ark (the same writer says) he took the body of Adam in a coffin with him and when he left the ark restored it to the place he had taken it from

Adam, a bulliff, a jailor

Not that Adam that kept the paradise but that Adam that kept the jail on — Shakespeare Comedy of Errors, act I r - 3 (1593)

Adam, a faithful retainer in the family of sir Rowland de Boys. At the age of four score, he voluntarily accompanied his young master Orlando into exile, and offered to give him his little savings. He has given birth to the phrase, "A faithful Adam" [or man-servant]—Shakespeare, As You Like It (1598)

Adam's Ale, water

Adam's Profession, tillage, gardening

When Adam delved and Eve span
Who was then the gentleman?

Ray's Proverbs

There is no ancient gentleman but gardeners, ditchers and grave-makers they hold up Adam's profession—Shakespeare Hamlet act v. sc. 1 (1616)

Adam Bell, a northern outlaw, noted for his archery. The name, like those of Clyn of the Clough, William of Cloudestly, Robin Hood, and Little John, is synonymous with a good archer

Adamas or Adamant, the mineral called corundum, and sometimes the diamond, one of the hardest substances known

Allrecht was as firm as Adamas—Schmidt, Cerrito (translated)

Adamastor, the Spirit of the Cape, a hideous phantom, of unearthly pallor, "erect his hair uprose of withered red, his lips were black, his teeth blue and disjointed, his beard haggard, his face scarred by lightning, his eyes shot livid fire, his voice roared." The sailors trembled at sight of him, and the fiend demanded how they dared to trespass "where never hero braved his rage before?" He then told them "that every year the shipwrecked should be made to deplore their foolhardiness"—Camöens, The Lusiad, v (1569)

Adam'ida, a planet on which reside the unborn spirits of saints, martyrs, and believers. Uriel, the angel of the sun, was ordered at the crucifixion to interpose this planet between the sun and the earth, so as to produce a total eclipse

Adamida, in obedience to the divine command flew amid overwhelming storms rushing clouds falling mountains, and swelling sea. Uriel stood on the pole of the star but so lost in deep contemplation on Golgotha that he heard not the wild uproar. On coming to the region of the sun Adamida slackened her course and advancing before the sun covered its face and intercepted all its rays.—Klopstock The Messiah viii. (1771).

Adams (John), one of the mutineers of the Bounty (1790), who settled in Tahiti. In 1814 he was discovered as the patriarch of a colony, brought up with a high sense of religion and strict regard to morals. In 1839 the colony was voluntarily placed under the protection of the British Government

Adams (Parson), the beau-ideal of a simple-minded, benevolent, but eccentric country clergyman, of unswerving integrity, solid learning, and genuine piety, bold as a lion in the cause of truth, but modest as a girl in all personal matters, wholly ignorant of the world, being "in it but not of it"—Fielding, Joseph Andrews (1712)

His learning his simplicity his excellent purity of mind are so admirably mingled with pedantry absence of mind and the halit of ostentatious exercise that he may be safely termed one of the richest productions of the muse of fiction. Like don Quixote parson Adams is deafen'd all the too much and too often but the mischief lies upon his shoulders without the slightest stain to his reputation—Sir W. Scott.

Adder (draf) It is said in fable that the adder, to prevent hearing the voice of a charmer, lays one ear on the ground and sticks his tail into the other

when man wol to him enchante
He legeth downe one eare all fast
Unto the grounle and hald it fast
And eke that other eare als faste
He toppeth with his tail to sore
That he the wordes heere or more
Of his enchantment ne heereh
Gower De Consolatione Amantis l. x. (1400)

Adder's Tongue, that is, ophio-glossum

For them that are with [by] newts or snakes or adders alone

He seeketh out an herb that call I adder's tongue
Drayton, Polyolion xiii (1613)

Adelaide, daughter of the count of Narbonne, in love with Theodore. She is killed by her father in mistake for another—Robt. Jephson, Count of Narbonne (1782)

Adeline (Lady), the wife of lord Henry Amundeville (4 syl), a highly educated aristocratic lady, with all the virtues and weaknesses of the upper ten. After the parliamentary sessions this noble pair filled their house with guests, amongst which were the duchess of Fitz-Fulke, the duke of D—, Aurora Raby, and don Juan "the Russian envoy." The tale not being finished, no sequel to these names is given (For the lady's character, see xiv. 51-56)—Byron, Don Juan, xiii to the end

Ademar or Adema'ro, archbishop of Poggio, an ecclesiastical warrior in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered—See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable

Adicia, wife of the soldan, who incites him to distress the kingdom of Merculla. When Merculla sends her ambassador, Sinuent, to negotiate peace,

Adicia, in violation of international law, thrusts her [Samient] out of doors like a dog, and sets two knights upon her. Sir Artergal comes to her rescue, attacks the two knights, and knocks one of them from his saddle with such force that he breaks his neck. After the discomfiture of the soldan, Adicia rushes forth with a knife to stab Samient, but, being intercepted by sir Artergal, is changed into a tigress—Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 8 (1696)

* * * The "soldan" is king Philip II of Spain, "Mereilla" is queen Elizabeth, "Adicia" is Injustice personified, or the bigotry of popery, and "Samient" the ambassadors of Holland, who went to Philip for redress of grievances, and were most iniquitously detained by him as prisoners

Ad'icus, Unrighteousness personified in canto vii of The Pulp's Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher. He has eight sons and daughters, viz., Pe'thos (hatred), Iris (variance), a daughter, Zelos (emulation), Thumos (wrath), Frith'ius (strife), Diabol'us (sedition), Envy, and Phon'os (murder), all fully described by the poet. (Greek, adikos, 'an unjust man')

Adie of Aikenshaw, a neighbour of the Glendinnings—Sir W Scott, The Monastery (tune, Elizabeth)

Admet'us, a king of Thessaly, husband of Alcestis. Apollo, being condemned by Jupiter to serve a mortal for twelve months for slaying a Cyclops, entered the service of Admetus. James R Lowell, of Boston, U S, has a poem on the subject, called The Shepherd of King Admetus (1819-)

Ad'mirable (The) (1) Aben-Esra, a Spanish rabbin, born at Toledo (1119-1173) (2) James Crichton (Kry-ton), the Scotchman (1551-1573) (3) Roger Bacon, called "The Admirable Doctor" (1214-1292)

Adolf, bishop of Cologne, was devoured by mice or rats in 1112 (See HATTO)

Ad'ona, a seraph, the tutelar spirit of James, the "first martyr of the twelve"—Klopstock, The Messiah, iii (1748)

A'donbec el Hakim, the physician, a disguise assumed by Saladin, who visits sir Kenneth's sick squire, and cures him of a fever—Sir W Scott, The Talisman (tune, Richard I.)

Adonis, a beautiful youth, beloved by Venus and Proserpina, who quarrelled about the possession of him. Jupiter, to settle the dispute, decided that the boy should spend six months with Venus in the upper world and six with Proserpina in the lower. Adonis was gored to death by a wild boar in a hunt.

Shakespeare has a poem called Venus and Adonis. Shelley calls his elegy on the poet Keats Adonais, in reference to Bion's beautiful elegy, The Lament of Adonis. George IV was called the Adonis of 50.

(Adonis is an allegory of the sun, which is six months north of the horizon, and six months south. Thammar is the same as Adonis, and so is Osiris.)

Adonis Flower, the phœbeant's eye or red mouth, called in French goutte de sang, and said to have sprung from the blood of Adonis, who was killed by a wild boar.

O fleur si chère à Cythérée
Ta corolle fut, et si vaillant,
Du sang d'Adonis colorée

Anonymus

Adonis's Garden. It is said that Adonis delighted in gardens, and had a magnificent one. Pliny says (xix 4), "Antiquitas nihil prius mirata est quam Hierosolimum hortos, ac regnum Adonidis et Alemin."

How vain I labour there for thine sweet rest
Thy pleasures are like Adonis' garden:
That one day bloomed and fruitful were the next.
Shakespeare Henry IV act i sc 6 (1-4)

An Adonis garden, a very short-lived pleasure, a temporary garden of cut flowers, an horticultural or floricultural show. The allusion is to the fennel and lettuce jars of the ancient Greeks, called "Adonis' gardens," because these plants were reared for the annual festival of Adonis, and were thrown away when the festival was over.

Ad'oram, a seraph, who had charge of James the son of Alpha'us—Klopstock, The Messiah, iii (1716)

Adosinda, daughter of the Gothie governor of Auria, in Spain. The Moors having slaughtered her parents, husband, and child, preserved her alive for the captain of Alcahman's regiment. She went to his tent without the least resistance, but implored the captain to give her one night to mourn the death of those so near and dear to her. To this he complied, but during sleep she murdered him with his own scymitar Roderick, disguised as a monk, helped her to bury the dead bodies of her house, and then she vowed to live for only one object, vengeance. In the great battle, when the Moors were overthrown, she it was who gave the word of attack, "Victory and Vengeance!"—Southey, Roderick, etc., iii (1811)

Adram'elech (ch=h), one of the fallen angels. Milton makes him overthrown by U'riel and Raphael (Paradise Lost, vi 365). According to Scripture, he was one of the idols of Sepharvaim, and Shalmane'ser introduced his worship into Samaria [The word means "the mighty magnificent king"]

Klopstock introduces him into The Messiah, and represents him as surpassing Satan in malice and guile, ambition and mischief. He is made to hate every one, even Satan, of whose rank he is jealous, and whom he hoped to overthrow, that by putting an end to his servitude he might become the supreme god of all the created world. At the crucifixion he and Satan are both driven back to hell by Obad'don, the angel of death.

Adraste' (2 syl.), a French gentleman, who enveigles a Greek slave named Isidore from don Pèdre. His plan is thus. He gets introduced as a portrait-painter, and thus imparts to Isidore his love and obtains her consent to elope with him. He then sends his slave Zaïde (2 syl.) to don Pèdre, to crave protection for ill treatment, and Pèdre promises to befriend her. At this moment Adraste appears, and demands that Zaïde be given up to him to punish as he thinks proper. Pèdre intercedes, Adraste seems to relent, and Pèdre calls for Zaïde. Out comes Isidore instead, with Zaïde's veil. "There," says Pèdre, "take her and use her well." "I will do so," says the Frenchman, and leads off the Greek slave.—Molière, Le Sicilien ou L'Amour Peintre (1667).

A'dria, the Adriatic

Fled over Adria to the Herperian fields [Italy].
Milton Paradise Lost i 629 (1665).

Adrian'a, a wealthy Ephesian lady, who marries Antipholus, twin-brother of Antipholus of Syracuse. The abbess Emilia is her mother-in-law, but she knows it not, and one day when she accuses her husband of infidelity, she says to the abbess, if he is unfaithful it is not from want of remonstrance, "for it is the one subject of our conversation. In bed I will not let him sleep for speaking of it, at table I will not let him eat for speaking of it, when alone with him I talk of nothing else, and in company I give him frequent hints of it. In a word, all my talk is how vile and bad it is in him to love another better than he loves his wife" (act v sc 1)—Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors (1593).

Adria'no de Arma'do (Don), a pompous, fantastical Spaniard, a military braggart in a state of peace, as Parolles (3 syl.) was in war. Boastful but poor, a corner of words but very ignorant, solemnly grave but ridiculously awkward, majestic in gait but of very low propensities.—Shakespeare, Love's Labour Lost (1594).

(Said to be designed for John Florio, surnamed "The Resolute," a philologist, Holofernes, the pedantic schoolmaster, in the same play, is also meant in ridicule of the same lexicographer.)

Adria'tic wedded to the Doge. The ceremony of wedding the Adriatic to the doge of Venice was instituted in 1174 by pope Alexander III, who gave the doge a gold ring from his own finger in token of the victory achieved by the Venetian fleet at Istria over Frederick Barbarossa. The pope, in giving the ring, desired the doge to throw a similar one into the sea every year on Ascension-Day in commemoration of this event. The doge's brigantine was called Bucentaur.

You may remember scarce five years are past
Since in your brigantine you sailed to sea
The Adriatic wedded to our duke.

T. Otway Louise Rastrel L 1 (1682).

Ad'riel, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, the earl of Mulgrave, a royalist.

Sharp-judging Adriel the Muses fri and himself a muse. In unbedim'd hate

(John Sheffield, earl of Mulgrave (1649-1721) wrote an Essay on Poetry.)

Æacus king of Cœn'opia, a man of such integrity and piety, that he was made at death one of the three judges of hell. The other two were Minos and Rhadaman'thus.

Æge'on, a huge monster with 100 arms and 50 heads who with his brothers, Cottus and Gyges, conquered the Titans.

by hurling at them 300 rocks at once. Homer says nēn call him "Tge'on," but by the gods he is called Bri'areus (3 syl.).

(Milton recents the word on the first syllable and so does Fairfax in his translation of Tasso—See Paradise Lost, i. 746.)

Æge'on, a merchant of Syracuse, in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors (1593)

Ægri'na, a rocky island in the Syracusan gulf. It was near this island that the Athenians won the famous naval battle of Salamis over the fleet of Xerxes, n.c. 480. The Athenian prows were decorated with a figure-head of Athē'nē or Minerva.

And of all
Fetters the virgin from the broken prow
Of Athens o'er Ægina's gloomy surge
Overwhelming all the Persian round and glory Alike like Nyrin to the Arlo to.

Ælia Læ'lia [Crispis], an inexplicable riddle, so called from an inscription in Latin, preserved in Bologna, which may be rendered thus into English

ÆLIA LÆLIA CRISPIS

Neither man nor woman nor androgyne
Neither girl nor boy nor eïd,
Neither hadst nor virgin
But all [of these]

Carried off neither by hunger nor sword nor poison,
But by all [of these].
Neither in heaven nor in the water nor in the earth,
But billing everywhere

LLCIUS AGATHO PRISCUS

Neither the best and nor the worst nor friend
Neither grieving nor rejoicing nor weeping,
But [doing] all [these]

This—neither a pile nor a pyramid nor a sepulchre
That is fit, be it known and known not [which it is].
It is a sepulchre containing no corpse within it
It is a corpse with no grave close containing it.
But the corpse and the sepulchre are one and the same.

It would serve to guide a man to the solution of the Ælia Læ'lia Crispis—J. W. Draper

Æmelia, a lady of high degree, in love with Am'ias, a squire of inferior rank. Going to meet her lover at a trysting-place, she was caught up by a hideous monster, and thrust into his den for future food. Belphe'bē (3 syl.) slew "the emissary" and released the maid (canto vii). Prince Arthur, having slain Corlambio, released Am'ias from the durance of Pœ'nā, Corlambio's daughter, and brought the lovers together "in peace and settled rest" (canto ix).—Spenser, Fairy Queen, iv. (1596)

Æmil'ia, wife of Æge'on the Syracusan merchant, and mother of the twins called Antipholus. When the boys were shipwrecked, she was parted from them and taken to Ephesus. Here she entered a convent, and rose to be the abbess.

Without her knowing it, one of her twins also settled in Ephesus, and rose to be one of its greatest and richest citizens. The other son and her husband Ægeon both set foot in Ephesus the same day without the knowledge of each other, and all met together in the duke's court, when the story of their lives was told, and they became again united to each other—Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors (1593)

Æmon'ian Arts, magic, so called from Æmon'ia (Thessaly), noted for magic. The Æmonian Jason was so called because his father was king of Æmonia.

Æne'as, a Trojan prince, the hero of Virgil's epic called Æneid. He was the son of Anchises and Venus. His first wife was Cren'ea (3 syl.), by whom he had a son named Ascan'ius, his second wife was Lavinia, daughter of Latinus king of Italy, by whom he had a posthumous son called Fne'as Silvius. He succeeded his father-in-law in the kingdom, and the Romans called him their founder.

According to Geoffrey of Monmouth "Brutus," the first king of Britain (from whom the island was called Britain), was a descendant of Æne'as.

Æne'id, the epic poem of Virgil, in twelve books. When Troy was taken by the Greeks and set on fire, Æne'as, with his father, son, and wife, took flight, with the intention of going to Italy, the original birthplace of the family. The wife was lost, and the old father died on the way, but after numerous perils by sea and land, Æne'as and his son Ascan'ius reached Italy. Here Latinus, the reigning king, received the exiles hospitably, and proposed his daughter Lavinia in marriage to Æne'as, but she had been already betrothed by her mother to prince Turnus, son of Daunus, king of Rutuli, and Turnus would not forego his claim. Latinus, in this dilemma, and the rivals must settle the dispute by an appeal to arms. Turnus being slain, Æne'as married Lavinia, and ere long succeeded his father-in-law on the throne.

Book I. The escape from Troy, Æne'as and his son, driven by a tempest on the shores of Carthage, are hospitably entertained by queen Dido.

II. Æne'as tells Dido the tale of the wooden horse, the burning of Troy, and his flight with his father, wife, and son. The wife was lost and died.

III. The narrative continued. The perils he met with on the way, and the death of his father.

IV Dido falls in love with Æneas, but he steals away from Carthage, and Dido, on a funeral pyre, puts an end to her life

V Æneas reaches Sicily, and celebrates games in honour of Anchises. This book corresponds to the Iliad, xxiii

VI Æneas visits the infernal regions. This book corresponds to Odyssey, vi

VII Latinus king of Italy, entertains Æneas, and promises to him Lavinia (his daughter) in marriage, but prince Turnus had been already betrothed to her by the mother, and raises an army to resist Æneas

VIII Preparations on both sides for a general war

IX Turnus, during the absence of Æneas, fires the ships and assaults the camp. The episode of Nisus and Euryalus

X The war between Turnus and Æneas. Episode of Mezentius and Lausus

XII Turnus challenges Æneas to single combat, and is killed

NOTE—1 The story of Sinon and taking of Troy is borrowed from Virgil as Macrobius informs us

2 The loves of Dido and Æneas are copied from those of Nisida and Jason in Apollonius

3 The story of the wooden horse and the burning of Troy are from Arctimachus of Miletus

Æolus, god of the winds, which he keeps imprisoned in a cave in the Æolian Islands, and lets free as he wishes or as the over-gods command

African Magician (The), pretended to Aladdin to be his uncle, and sent the lad to fetch the "wonderful lamp" from an underground cavern. As Aladdin refused to hand it to the magician, he shut him in the cavern and left him there. Aladdin contrived to get out by virtue of a magic ring, and learning the secret of the lamp, became immensely rich, built a superb palace, and married the sultan's daughter. Several years after, the African resolved to make himself master of the lamp, and accordingly walked up and down before the palace, crying incessantly, "Who will change old lamps for new?" Aladdin being on a hunting excursion, his wife sent a eunuch to exchange the "wonderful lamp" for a new one, and forthwith the magician commanded "the slaves of the lamp to transport the palace and all it contained into Africa. Aladdin caused him to be poisoned in a draught of wine—Arabian Nights ('Aladdin or The Wonderful Lamp')

Agandecca, daughter of Starno king of Lochlin [Scandinavia], promised in marriage to Fingal king of Morven [North-west of Scotland]. The maid told Fingal to beware of her father, who had set an ambush to kill him. Fingal, being thus forewarned, slew the men in ambush, and Starno, in rage, murdered his daughter, who was buried by Fingal in Arden [Argyll].

The daughter of the snow overheard and left the hall of her secret sigh. She came in all her beauty like the moon from the cloud of the east. Loveliness was around her as light. Her step was like the rust of songs. She saw the youth and loved him. He was the stolen sigh of her soul. Her blue eyes rolled in secret on him and she blessed the chief of Morven—Ossian (Fingal" III)

Agape (3 syl) the fay. She had three sons at a birth, Primond, Diamond, and Triamond. Being anxious to know the future lot of her sons, she went to the abyss of Demogorgon, to consult the "Three Fatal Sisters." Clotho showed her the threads, which "were thin as those spun by a spider." She begged the fates to lengthen the life-threads, but they said this could not be, they consented, however, to this agreement—

When ye shared with fatal knife
His line which is the shortest of the three Eftsoon his life was o'er—
And when

Tennyson Gareth and Lynette.

Agast'ya (3 syl), a dwarf who drank the sea dry. As he was walking one day with Vishnoo, the insolent ocean asked the god who the pigmy was that strutted by his side. Vishnoo replied it was the patriarch Agastya, who was going to restore earth to its true balance. Ocean, in contempt, spat its spray in the pigmy's face, and the sage, in revenge of this affront, drank the waters of the ocean, leaving the bed quite dry.—Murice

Aged (The), so Wemmick's father is called. He lived in "the castle at Walworth." Wemmick at "the castle" and Wemmick in business are two "different beings"

Wemmick's house was a little wooden cottage in the midst of plots of garden and the top of it was cut out and painted like a battery mounted with guns. It was the smallest of houses with queer Gothic windows (by far the greater part of them shram) and a Gothic door almost too small to get in at. On Sundays he ran up a real flag. The bridge was a plank and it crossed a chann about four feet wide and two deep. At nine o'clock every night the gun fired the gun being mounted in a separate fortress made of lattice work. It was protected from the weather by a tarpaulin umbrella.—C Dickens Great Expectations xxy (1869)

Ag'ib (King), "The Third Calendar" (Arabian Nights' entertainments) He was wrecked on the loadstone mountain, which drew all the nails and iron bolts from his ship, but he overthrew the bronze statue on the mountain-top, which was the cause of the mischief. Ag'ib visited the ten young men, each of whom had lost the right eye, and was carried by a roc to the palace of the forty princesses, with whom he tarried a year. The princesses were then obliged to leave for forty days, but entrusted him with the keys of the palace, with free permission to enter every room but one. On the fortieth day curiosity induced him to open this room, where he saw a horse, which he mounted, and was carried through the air to Bagdad. The horse then deposited him, and knocked out his right eye with a whisk of its tail, as it had done the ten "young men" above referred to Ag'nes, daughter of Mr Wickfield the solicitor, and David Copperfield's second wife (after the death of Dora, "his child wife") Agnes is a very pure, self-

sacrificing girl, accomplished, yet domestic—C Dickens, David Copperfield (1819)

Agnes, in Molière's L'École des Femmes, the girl on whom Arnolphe tries his pet experiment of education, so as to turn out for himself a "model wife." She was brought up in a country convent, where she was kept in entire ignorance of the difference of sex, conventional proprieties, the difference between the love of men and women, and that of girls for girls, the mysteries of marriage, and so on. When grown to womanhood she quits the convent, and standing one evening on a balcony a young man passes and takes off his hat to her, she returns the salute, he bows a second and third time, she does the same, he passes and re-passes several times, bowing each time, and she does as she has been taught to do by acknowledging the salute. Of course, the young man (Horace) becomes her lover, whom she marries, and M Arnolphe loses his "model wife" (See PUNCHWIT)

Black Agnes, the palfrey of Mary queen of Scots, the gift of her brother Moray, and so called from the noted countess of March, who was countess of Moray (Murray) in her own right

Agnes (St), a young virgin of Palermo, who at the age of thirteen was martyred at Rome during the Diocletian persecution of A.D. 304. Prudence (Aurelius Prudentius Clemens), a Latin Christian poet of the fourth century, has a poem on the subject. Tintoret and Domenichino have both made her the subject of a painting—The Martyrdom of St Agnes

St Agnes and the Devil. St Agnes, having escaped from the prison at Rome, took shipping and landed at St Piran Arwothall. The devil dogged her, but she rebuked him, and the large moor-stones between St Piran and St Agnes, in Cornwall, mark the places where the devils were turned into stone by the looks of the indignant saint—Potwhele, History of Cornwall

mant, king of the Moors, in Orlando Innamorato, by Bojardo, and Orlando Inuioso, by Ariosto. Son of Troyano

Agrawain (Sir) or Sir Agrava, surnamed "The Desirous" and also "The Haughty." He was son of Lot (king of Orkney) and Margawse half-sister of king Arthur. His brothers were sir Gawain, sir Gareth, and sir Gureth Mordred was his half-brother, being the son of king Arthur and Margawse. Sir Agrava and sir Mordred hated sir Lancelot, and told the king he was too familiar with the queen, so they asked the king to spend the day in hunting, and kept watch. The queen sent for sir Lancelot to her private chamber, and sir Agrava, sir Mordred, and twelve others assailed the door, but sir Lancelot slew them all except sir Mordred, who escaped.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, iii 112-145 (1170)

Agrica'ne (1 syl), king of Tartary, in the Orlando Innamorato, of Bojardo. He besieges Albracca in the castle of Albracca, and is slain in single combat by Orlando. He brought into the field 2,200,000 troops

Each force met no nor so wide a camp
When Agrica'ne with all his northern powers Besieged Albracca.

Milton, Paradise Regaine l iii (161)

Agrios, Lumpishness personified, a "sullen swain, all mirth that in himself and others hated, dull, dead, and leaden." Described in canto viii of The Purple Island, by Phineas I Fletcher (1635). (Greek, agrios, "a savage.")

Agrippina was granddaughter, wife, sister, and mother of an emperor. She was granddaughter of Augustus, wife of Claudius, sister of Caligula, and mother of Nero.

* * Lam'pedo of Lacedaemon was daughter, wife, sister, and mother of a king.

Agripy'na or Ag'ripyne (3 syl), a princess beloved by the "king of Cyprus" son, and madly loved by Orleans.—Thomas Dekker, Old Fortunatus (a comedy, 1600).

Ag'ue (2 syl). It was an old superstition that if the fourth book of the Iliad was laid open under the head of a person suffering from Quartan ague, it would cure him at once. Serenus Sammonicus (preceptor of Gordian), a noted physician, has amongst his medical precepts the following—

Macoter, Nlades quantum suppone tim ntl

Ague-cheek (Sir Andrew), a silly old top with "3000 ducats a year," very fond of the table, but with a shrewd understanding that "beef had done harm to his wit." Sir Andrew thinks himself "old in nothing but in understanding," and boasts that he can "cut a caper, dance the coranto, walk a jig, and take delight in masques," like a young man.—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night (1614)

Woodward (177-177) always sustained "sir Andrew Ague-cheek" with infinite drollery assisted by that expression of rueful dismay which gave so peculiar a zest to his Marplot—Borden, Life of Siddons

Charles Lamb says that "Jem White saw James Dodd one evening in Ague-cheek and recognising him next day in Fleet Street, took off his hat, and saluted him with 'Save you sir Andrew!' Dodd sharply waved his hand and exclaimed 'Away fool!'"

A'haback and Des'ra, two enchanters, who aided Ahu'bal in his rebellion against his brother Misnar, sultan of Delhi. Ahu'bal had a magnificent tent built, and Hormi the vizier had one built for the sultan still more magnificent. When the rebels made their attack, the sultan and the best of the troops were drawn off, and the sultan's tent was taken. The enchanters, delighted with their prize, slept therein, but at night the vizier led the sultan to a cave, and asked him to cut a rope. Next morning he heard that a huge stone had fallen on the enchanters and crushed them to mummies. In fact, this stone formed the head of the bed, where it was suspended by the rope which the sultan had severed in the night.—James Ridley, Tales of the Genn ("The Enchanters' Tale," vi.)

Ahasue'rus, the cobbler who pushed away Jesus when, on the way to execution, He rested a moment or two at his door. "Get off! Away with you!" cried the cobbler. "Fruit, I go away," returned Jesus, "and that quickly, but tarry thou till I come." And from that time Ahasuerus became the "wandering Jew" who still roams the earth, and will continue so to do till the "second coming of the Lord." This is the legend given by Paul von Litzow, bishop of Schleswig (1647)—Greve, Memoir of Paul von Litzow (1714).

Aher'man and Ar'gon, the former a fortress, and the latter a suite of immense halls, in the realm of Lblis, where are lodged all creatures of human intelligence before the creation of Adam, and all the animals that inhabited the earth before the present races existed.—W Beckford, Fathel (1786)

given him by the fair Paribanou, which would cover a whole army, and yet would fold up so small that it might be carried in one's pocket. The same good fairy also gave him the apple of Samarcand', a panacea for all diseases — Arabian Nights' Entertainments ("Prince Ahmed, etc.")

* * * Solomon's carpet of green silk was large enough for all his army to stand upon, and when arranged the carpet was wafted with its freight to any place the king desired. This carpet would also fold into a very small compass.

The ship Shudbladur had a similar elastic virtue, for though it would hold all the inhabitants of Valhalla, it might be folded up like a sheet of paper.

Bayrd, the horse of the four sons of Aymon, grew larger or smaller as one or more of the four sons mounted it. (See AYMON.)

Aholiba'mah, granddaughter of Cain, and sister of Anah. She was loved by the seraph Samias'a, and like her sister was carried off to another planet when the Flood came — Byron, Heaven and Earth.

Proud, imperious and aspiring she denies that she worships the seraph, and declares that his immortality can bestow no love more pure and warm than her own, and she expresses a conviction that there is a ray within her which though forbidden yet to shine is nevertheless lighted at the same ethereal fire as his own — Flinden Byron's Beauties.

Ahriman or Ahrima'nes (4 syl.), the angel of darkness and of evil in the Magian system. Slain by Mithra.

A'idenn. So Poe calls Eden, reproducing the Arabic form.

Tell this soul with sorrow laden
If within the di'ar A'idenn
It shall clasp a valiant maiden
Whom the angels name Lenore Edgar Poe The Raven.

Aikwood (Ringan), the forester of Sir Arthur Wardour, of Knoekwinnoek Castle — Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Aim'well (Thomas, viscount), a gentleman of broken fortune, who gives his addresses to Dorinda, daughter of Lady Bountiful. He is very handsome and fascinating, but quite "a man of the world." He and Archer are the two beaux of The Beau's Stratagem, a comedy by George Farquhar (1705).

I thought it rather odd that Holland should be the only minister of the party and I said to myself as Gibbet said when he heard that Almuwall had gone to church. That looks suspicious" (act II. sc. 2.) — James Knollys Memoirs Letters etc. (1849).

Alu'lie (The earl of), a royalist in the service of King Charles I. — Sir W. Scott, Legend of Montrose.

Aury (Sir George), a man of fortune, in love with Miranda, the ward of Sir Francis Gripe — Mrs. Centlivre, The Busybody (1709).

A'jax, son of Oileus [O'rluce], generally called "the less." In consequence of his insolence to Cassand'ra, the prophetic daughter of Priam, his ship was driven on a rock, and he perished at sea — Homer, Odyssey, ii. 507, Virgil, Æneid, i. 41.

A'jax Tel'amon. Sophocles has a tragedy called Ajax, in which "the madman" scourges a ram he mistakes for Ulysses. His encounter with a flock of sheep, which he fancied in his madness to be the sons of Atreus, has been mentioned at greater or less length by several Greek and Roman poets. Don Quixote had a similar adventure. This Ajax is introduced by Shakespeare in his drama called Troilus and Cressida. (See ALIPHARON.)

Ala'ciel, the genius who went on a voyage to the two islands, Taeturnia and Merryland [London and Paris] — De la Dismerie Isle Taciturne et l'île Enjouée, ou Voyage du Génie Ala'ciel dans les deux îles (1754).

Aladdin, son of Mustafa a poor tailor, of China, "obstinate, disobedient and mischievous," wholly abandoned "to indolence and licentiousness." One day an African magician accosted him pretending to be his uncle, and sent him to bring up the "wonderful lamp," at the same time giving him a "ring of safety." Aladdin secured the lamp, but would not hand it to the magician till he was out of the cave, whereupon the magician shut him up in the cave, and departed for Africa. Aladdin, wringing his hands in despair, happened to rub the magic ring, when the genius of the ring appeared before him, and asked him his commands. Aladdin requested to be delivered from the cave, and he returned home. By means of his lamp, he obtained untold wealth, built a superb palace, and married Badroul'boudour, the sultan's daughter. After a time, the African magician got possession of the lamp, and caused the palace, with all its contents, to be transported into Africa. Aladdin was absent at the time, was arrested and ordered to execution, but was rescued by the populace, with whom he was an immense favourite, and started to discover what had become of his palace. Happening to slip, he rubbed his ring, and when the genius of the ring appeared and asked his orders, was instantly posted to the place where his palace was in Africa. He poisoned the magician, regained the lamp, and had his palace restored to its original place in China.

Yes, ready money is Aladdin's lamp
Lyon, Don Juan xii. 12.

Aladdin's Lamp, a lamp brought from an underground cavern in "the middle of China." Being in want of food, the mother of Aladdin began to scrub it, intending to sell it, when the genius of the lamp appeared, and asked her what were her commands. Aladdin answered, "I am hungry, bring me food," and immediately a banquet was set before him. Having thus become acquainted with the merits of the lamp, he became enormously rich, and married the sultan's daughter. By artifice the African magician got possession of the lamp and transported the palace with its contents to Africa. Aladdin poisoned the magician, recovered the lamp, and retranslated the palace to its original site.

Aladdin's Palace Windows. At the top of the palace was a saloon, containing twenty-four windows (six on each side), and all but one enriched with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds. One was left for the sultan to complete, but all the jewellers in the empire were unable to make one to match the others, so Aladdin commanded "the slaves of the lamp" to complete their work.

Aladdin's Ring, given him by the African magician, "a preservative against every evil"—Arabian Nights ("Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp").

Al'adine, the sagacious but cruel king of Jerusalem, slain by Raymond—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1375).

Al'adine (3 syl), son of Aldus "a lusty knight"—Spenser, Fairy Queen, vi. 3 (1596).

Alaff, Anlaf, or Olaf, son of Sibtrie, Dni-h king of Northumberland (died 927). When Athelstan [Athelstan] took possession of Northumberland, Alaff fled to Ireland, and his brother Guthfrith or Godfrey to Scotland.

Alar'con king of Barca, who joined the armament of Egypt against the crusader, but his men were only half armed—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1375).

Alaric Cottin. Iederick the Great of Prussia was so called by Voltaire "Alaric because, like Alaric, he was a great warrior, and 'Cottin' because, like Cottin, satirized by Boileau, he was a very indifferent poet."

Alas'co, alias Dr. DEMITRIUS DO-NOON, an old astrologer, consulted by the earl of Leicester—Sir W. Scott, Kenilworth, ch. xvii, xviii (time, Elizabeth).

Alas'nam (Prince Zayn) possessed eight statues, each a single diamond on a gold pedestal, but had to go in search of a ninth, more valuable than them all. This ninth was a lady, the most beautiful and virtuous of women, "more precious than rubies," who became his wife.

One pure and perfect (to woman) is like Alasnam's lady worth them all.—Sir Walter Scott

Alasnam's Mirror. When Alasnam was in search of his ninth statue, the king of the Genu gave him a test mirror, in which he was to look when he saw a beautiful girl, "if the glass remained pure and unsullied, the damsel would be the same, but if not, the damsel would not be wholly pure in body and in mind" This mirror was called "the touchstone of virtue"—Arabian Nights ("Prince Zeyn Alasnam")

Alas'tor, a house demon, the "skeleton in the cupboard," which haunts and torments a family. Shelley has a poem entitled Alastor or the Spirit of Solitude

Cicero says he meditated killing himself that he might become the Alastor of Augustus, whom he hated—His tarch Cicero etc. (Parallel Lives)

God Almighty mustered up an army of mice against the archbishop (Hatto), and sent them to persecute him as his furious Alastors—Coryat Crudities 71

Al'ban (St) of Verulam, hid his confessor, St Amphibal, and changing clothes with him, suffered death in his stead. This was during the frightful persecution of Maximianus Herodius, general of Diocletian's army in Britain, when 1000 Christians fell at Lichfield

Alban—our proto-martyr called.
Dryden Polyolbon xiv (1679)

Alba'nia, the Scotch Highlands, so called from Albanaet, son of Brute, the mythical Trojan king of Britain. At the death of Brute "Britain" was divided between his three sons. Loern had England, Albanaet had Albania (Scotland), and Kamber had Cambria (Wales)

He [Arthur] by force of arms Albania overrun Pursuing of the flets beyond mount Caledon.
Dryden Polyolbon iv (1612)

Alba'nia (Turkey in Asia) It means "the mountain region," and properly comprehends Schewan, Daghestan, and Georgia. In poetry it is used very loosely

Al'berck of MORTIMER, the same as Theodoric the hermit of Engaddi, an exiled nobleman. He tells king Richard the history of his life, and tries to dissuade him from sending a letter of defiance to the archduke of Austria—Sir W Scott, The Tahsman (time, Richard I)

Al'berck, the squire of prince Richard (one of the sons of Henry II of England)—Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Albert, commander of the Britannia Brave, liberal, and just, softened and refined by domestic ties and superior information. His ship was dashed against the projecting verge of Cape Colonna, the most southern point of Attica, and he perished in the sea because Rodmond (second in command) grasped on his legs and could not be shaken off

Albert, father of Gertrude, patriarch and judge of Wyoming (called by Campbell Wyoming). Both Albert and his daughter were shot by a mixed force of British and Indian troops, led by one Brandt, who made an attack on the settlement, put all the inhabitants to the sword, set fire to the fort, and destroyed all the houses—Campbell, Gertrude of Wyoming (1809)

Albert, in Goethe's romance called The Sorrows of Werther, is meant for his friend Kestner, a young German farmer, who marries Charlotte Buff (called "Lotte" in the novel), with whom Goethe was in love. Goethe represents himself as Werther (q v)

Albert of Gerstein (Count), brother of Arnold Biederman, and president of the "Secret Tribunal." He sometimes appears as a "black priest of St Pauls," and sometimes as the "monk of St Victoire"—Sir W Scott, Anne of Gerstein (time, Edward IV)

Albertaz'zo married Alda, daughter of Otho, duke of Saxony. His sons were Ugo and Luleo. From this stem springs the Roynl Family of England—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Al'bion In legendary history this word is variously accounted for. One derivation is from Albion, a giant, son of Neptune, its first discoverer, who ruled over the island for forty-four years

Another derivation is Al'bia, eldest of the fifty daughters of Diocletian king of Syria. These fifty ladies all married on the same day, and all murdered their husbands on the wedding night. By way of punishment, they were erst adrift in a ship, unruined, but the wind drove the vessel to our coast, where these Syrian damsels disembarked. Here they lived the rest of their lives and married with the aborigines, "a lawless crew of devils." Milton mentions this legend, and naïvely adds, "it is too absurd and unconscionably gross to be believed." Its resemblance to the fifty daughters of Dan'nos is palpable.

Drayton, in his Polyctor, says that Albion came from Rome, was "the first martyr of the land," and dying for the faith's sake, left his name to the country, where Ossia subsequently reared to him "a rich and sumptuous shrine, with a monastery attached."—Song xvi

Albion, king of Briton, when O'beron held his court in what is now called "Kensington Gardens." T. Tickell has a poem upon this subject.

Albion wars with Jove's Son Albion, son of Neptune, wars with Hercules, son of Jove. Neptune, dissatisfied with the snare of his father's kingdom, awarded to him by Jupiter, aspired to dethrone his brother, but Hercules took his father's part, and Albion was discomfited.

See Albion's War with Jove's Son, the son of Jove's son, in Polyctor, l. 101, ff. (1611).

Albo'rak, the animal brought by Gabriel to convey Mahomet to the seventh heaven. It had the face of a man, the cheeks of a horse, the wings of an eagle, and spoke with a human voice.

Albrac'ea, a castle of Cathay (China), to which Angelica retires in grief when she finds her love for Pinaldo is not reciprocated. Here she is besieged by Agincane king of Tartary, who is resolved to win her.—Bojardo, Orlando Furioso (1495).

Characterize our clocks, and tell what is a clocke
If the world say that he has it naughtly
Concocted and contrived for he was never taught
By Albura'zar, the astronomer
By the clock, place of astronomy
By the clock, this is a clocke (J. Henry VIII)

Alca'ro, the modern name of Memphis (Egypt).

Alceste (3 syl) or Alcestis, wife of Admetus. On his wedding day Admetus neglected to offer sacrifice to Diana, but Apollo induced the Fates to spare his life, if he could find a voluntary substitute. His bride offered to die for him, but Hercules brought her back from the world of shadows.

* * Euripides has a Greek tragedy on the subject (Alceste), Gluck has an opera (Alceste) libretto by Calzabigi (1765), Philippi Quinault produced a French tragedy entitled Alceste, in 1674, and Lagrange-Chancel in 1691 produced a French tragedy on the same subject.

Alceste (2 syl), the hero of Molière's comedy Le Mécanisme (1666), not unlike Imon of Athens, by Shakespeare. Alceste is in fact a pure and noble mind soured by pettish and disgusted with society. Courtesy seems to him the vice of fops, and the usages of civilized life no better than hypocrisy. Alceste pays his addresses to Calpurne, a coquette.

Alceste is an upright manly character, his wife and his friends are of the ordinary class of life.—Sir Walter Scott.

Alces'tis or Alces'tes (3 syl), daughter of Pel'ias and wife of Admetus, who gave herself up to death to save the life of her husband. Hercules fetched her from the grave, and restored her to her husband. Her story is told by Wm Morris, in The Jethro Paradise (June).

* * Longfellow, in The Golden Legend, has a somewhat similar story. Henry of Hohenbach was like to die, and was told he would recover if he could find a maiden willing to lay down her life for him. Else, the daughter of Gottlieb (a tenant farmer of the prince), vowed to do so, and followed the prince to Salerno, to surrender herself to Lucifer, but the prince rescued her, and made her his wife. The excitement and exercise cured the indolent young prince.

Alchemist (The), the last of the three great comedies of Ben Jonson (1610). The other two are Volpone (2 syl), (1605), and The Silent Woman (1609). The object of The Alchemist is to ridicule the belief in the philosopher's stone and the elixir of life. The alchemist is "Subtle," a mere quack, and "Sir Epicure Mammon" is the chief dupe, who supplies money, etc., for the "transmutation of metal." "Abel Druggier" a tobacconist, and "Dapper" a lawyer's clerk, are two other dupes. "Captain Face," alias "Jeremy," the house-servant of "Lovewit," and "Dol Common" are his allies. The whole thing is blown up by the unexpected return of "Lovewit."

Alcibi'ades (5 syl'), the Athenian general Being banished by the senate, he marches against the city, and the senate, being unable to offer resistance, open the gates to him (n.c. 450-404). This incident is introduced by Shakespeare in Timon of Athens.

Alcibiades has furnished Otway with the subject of an English tragedy (1672), and J. G. de Campistrion with one in French (Alcibiade, 1683).

Alcibi'ades' Tables represented a god or goddess outwardly, and a Silenus, or deformed piper, within. Trismus has a curious dissertation on these tables (Adage, 667, edit. R. Stephens), hence emblematic of falsehood and dissimulation.

Wine wants wisdom! — hence

No fair without, but most deformed within.
Wm. Browne Eriannia's Pastorals 1 (1613)

Alci'des, Heracles, son of Alceus, an strong and valiant hero. The drama called Hercules Furens is by Euripides. Seneca has a tragedy of the same title.

The Tempest, Act 1, Sc. 2.

M. Drayton, Symphidia (1603-1631)

Where is the great Alcides of the field
Valiant lord Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury?
Shakespeare, Henry 4 Act 1, Sc. 2. (1600)

Alci'na, Carnal Pleasure personified. In Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato she is a fairy, who carries off Astolfo. In Ariosto's Orlando Furioso she is a kind of Circe, whose garden is a scene of enchantment. Alci'na enjoys her lovers for a season, and then converts them into trees, stones, wild beasts, and so on, as her fancy dictates.

Al'ciphron or The Minute Philosopher the title of a work by bishop Berkeley, so called from the name of the chief speaker a freethinker. The object of this work is to expose the weakness of infidelity.

Al'ciphron, "the epicurean," the hero of T. Moore's romance entitled The Iphigean.

Like Alciphron we swing in air and darkness and know not whether the wind blows us — Uthman's Mega me

Alceme'na (in Molière, Alceme) the wife of Amphitryon, general of the Theban army. While her husband is absent warning against the Telebo'ans, Jupiter assumes the form of Amphitryon, but Amphitryon himself returns home the next day, and great confusion arises between the false and true Amphitryon, which is augmented by Mercury, who personates Sos'in, the slave of Amphitryon. By this amour of Jupiter, Alceme'na becomes the mother of Heracles. Plautus, Molière, and Dryden have all taken this plot for a comedy entitled Amphitryon.

Alcofr'bas, the pseudonym assumed by Rabelais in his Gargantua and Pantagruel. Alcofrabas Nasier is an anagram of "François Rabelais."

The inimitable life of the great Gargantua, father of Pantagruel heretofore composed by M. Alcofrabas, abstractor of the quintessence a book full of pantagruelism. — Rabelais, Introduction.

Al'colomb, "subduer of hearts," daughter of Abon Aihou of Damascus, and sister of Ganem. The caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, in a fit of jealousy, commanded Ganem to be put to death, and his mother and sister to do penance for three days in Damascus, and then to be banished from Syria. The two ladies came to Bagdad, and were taken in by the charitable syndec of the jewellers. When the jealous fit of the caliph was over he sent for the two exiles. Alcolomb he made his wife, and her mother he married to his vizier. — Arabian Nights ("Ganem, the Slave of Love").

Alcy'on, "the wofullest man alive," but once "the jolly shepherd swain that wont full merrily to pipe and dance," near where the Severn flows. One day he saw a lion's cub, and brought it up till it followed him about like a dog, but a cruel satyr shot it in mere wantonness. By the lion's cub he means Daphne, who died in her prime, and the cruel satyr is death. He said he hated everything—the heaven, the earth, fire, air, and sea, the day, the night, he hated to speak, to hear, to taste food, to see objects, to smell, to feel, he hated man and woman too, for his Daphne lived no longer. What became of this doleful shepherd the poet could never ween. Alcy'on is sir Arthur Gorges — Spenser, Daphnia (in seven fits, 1590).

And there is that Alcyon bent to mourn
Though fit to frame an everlasting ditty
Will see gentle spirit for Daphne's death doth turn Sweet lays of love to endless plaints of pity
Spenser Colin Clouts Come Home Again (1631)

Alcy'one or Halcyone (4 syl'), daughter of Æolus, who, on hearing of her husband's death by shipwreck, threw herself into the sea, and was changed to a kingfisher. (See HALCYON DAYS.)

Aldabella, wife of Orlando, sister of

Oliver, and daughter of Monodan'tès — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso, etc (1516)

Aldabella, a marchioness of Florence, very beautiful and fascinating, but arrogant and heartless. She used to give entertainments to the magnates of Florence, and Fazio was one who spent most of his time in her society. Bianca his wife, being jealous of the marchioness, accused him to the duke of being privy to the death of Bartoldo, and for this offence Fazio was executed. Bianca died broken-hearted, and Aldabella was condemned to spend the rest of her life in a nunnery — Dean Milman, Fazio (a tragedy, 1815)

Alden (John), one of the sons of the Pilgrim fathers, in love with Priscilla, the beautiful puritan Miles Standish, a bluff old soldier, wishing to marry Priscilla, asked John Alden to go and plead for him, but the maiden answered archly, "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" Soon after this, Standish being reported killed by a poisoned arrow, John spoke for himself, and was accepted. Standish, who was not really dead, appeared at the wedding, and said to John Alden—

I go to the sea to find love for myself and in return to marry you, for I shall be content at the vision of Charlotte.

Aldiger, son of Buovo, of the house of Clarmont, brother of Malagigi and Vivian. — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Aldine (2 syl), leader of the second squadron of Arabs which joined the Egyptian armament against the crusaders. Tasso says of the Arabs, "Their accents were female and their stature diminutive" (xvii) — Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

Aldingar (Sir), steward of queen Eleanor, wife of Henry II. He impeached the queen's fidelity, and agreed to prove his charge by single combat, but an angel (in the shape of a little child) established the queen's innocence. This is probably a blundering version of the story of Gunnhilda and the emperor Henry — Percey, Reliques, ii 9

Aldo, a Caledonian, was not invited by Fingal to his banquet on his return to Morven, after the overthrow of Swaran. To resent this affront, he went over to Fingal's avowed enemy, Erragon king of Sora (in Scandinavia), and here Iorna, the king's wife, fell in love with him. The guilty pair fled to Morven, which Erragon immediately invaded. Aldo fell in single combat with Erragon, Iorna died of grief, and Erragon was slain in battle by Gauri, son of Morri — Ossian ("The Battle of Lorn")

Alexander and Parmenio When Darius, king of Persia, offered Alexander his daughter Statira in marriage, with a dowry of 10,000 talents of gold, Parmenio said, "I would accept the offer, if I were Alexander" To this Alexander rejoined, "So would I, if I were Parmenio"

On another occasion the general thought the king somewhat too lavish in his gifts whereupon Alexander made answer, "I consider not what Parmenio ought to receive, but what Alexander ought to give"

Alexander and Perdicas When Alexander started for Asia he divided his possessions among his friends Perdicas asked what he had left for himself "Hope," said Alexander "If hope is enough for Alexander," replied the friend, "it is enough for Perdicas also," and declined to accept anything

Alexander and Raphael Alexander encountered Raphael in a cave in the mountain of Kaf, and being asked what he was in search of, replied, "The water of immortality" Whereupon Raphael gave him a stone, and told him when he found another of the same weight he would grant his wish "And how long," said Alexander, "have I to live?" The angel replied, "Till the heaven above thee and the earth beneath thee are of iron" Alexander now went forth and found a stone almost of the weight required, and in order to complete the balance, added a little earth, falling from his horse at Ghur he was laid in his armour on the ground, and his shield was set up over him to ward off the sun Then understood he that he would gain immortality when, like the stone, he was buried in the earth, and that his hour was come, for the earth beneath him was iron, and his iron buckler was his vault of heaven above So he died

Alexander and the Robber When Dionides, a pirate, was brought before Alexander, he exclaimed, "Vile brigand! how dare you infest the seas with your misdeeds?" "And you," replied the pirate, "by what right do you ravage the world? Because I have only one ship, I am called a brigand, but you who have a whole fleet are termed a conqueror" Alexander admired the man's boldness, and commanded him to be set at liberty

Alicia gave her heart to Mosby, but married Arden for his position. As a wife, she played falsely with her husband, and even joined Mosby in a plot to murder him. Vacillating between love for Mosby and respect for Arden, she repents, and goes on sinning, wishes to get disentangled, but is overmastered by Mosby's stronger will. Alicia's passions impel her to evil, but her judgment accuses her and prompts her to the right course. She halts, and parleys with sin, like Balaam, and of course is lost — Anon, Arden of Feversham (1592)

Alicia, "a laughing, toying, wheedling, whimpering she," who once held lord Hastings under her distaff, but her annoying jealousy, "revelations days, and jarring joyless nights," drove him away from her. Being jealous of Jane Shore, she accused her to the duke of Gloster of alluring lord Hastings from his allegiance, and the lord protector soon trumped up a charge against both, the lord chamberlain be ordered to execution for treason, and Jane Shore be persecuted for witchcraft. Alicia goes raving mad — Rowe, Jane Shore (1713)

The king of Denmark went to see Mrs Bellamy play Alicia, "and fell into a sound sleep. of those who traffic with the powers of darkness. — Francis de la Noue, Discourses 8th (1537)

Al Rakim [ah 'keem'] The meaning of this word is very doubtful. Some say it is the mountain or valley of the cave of the seven sleepers. Others think it is the name of the dog shut up in the cave with them, but probably it is a stone or metal tablet set up near the cave, containing the names of the seven sleepers and their dog Katmir — Sale, Al Acoran, viii note

Alimach, the demon who causes shipwrecks, and presides over storms and earthquakes. When visible it is always in the form and dress of a woman — Lustern Mythology

Alsa'tia, the Whitefriars' sanctuary for debtors and law-breakers. The name is taken from Alsatia (Alsace, in France), a seat of war and lawlessness when King James's son-in-law was the prince Palatine. Sir Walter Scott, in The Fortunes of Nigel, has graphically described the life and state of this rookery, but is greatly indebted to Shadwell's comedy, The Squire of Alsatia

Alscrip (Miss), "the heiress," a vulgar parvenue, affected, conceited, ill-natured, and ignorant. Having had a fortune left her, she assumes the airs of a woman of fashion, and exhibits the follies without possessing the merits of the upper ten

Mr Alscrip, the vulgar father of "the heiress," who finds the grandeur of sudden wealth a great bore, and in his new mansion, Berkeley Square, sighs for the snug comforts he once enjoyed as scrivener in Furnival's Inn — General Burgoyne, The Heiress (1781)

Al Siat', an imaginary bridge between earth and the Mahometan paradise, not so wide as a spider's thread. Those laden with sin fall over into the abyss below

Al'tamont, a young Genoese lord, who marries Calista, daughter of lord Seiolto (3 syl). On his wedding day he discovers that his bride has been seduced by Lothario, and a duel ensues, in which Lothario is killed, whereupon Calista stabs herself — N. Rowe, The Fair Penitent (1703)

[John Quick] commenced his career at Fulham, where he performed the character of Altamont, which he acted so much to the satisfaction of the manager that he desired his wife to set down young Quick a whole share, which at the close of the performance amounted to three shillings — Memories of John Quick (1831)

Altamo'rus, king of Samarcand', who joined the Egyptian armament against the crusaders. He surrendered himself to Godfrey, (bk. xx) — Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

Althæa's Brand. The Fates told Althæa that her son Meleager would live just as long as a log of wood then on the fire remained unconsumed. Althæa contrived to keep the log unconsumed for many years, but when her son killed her two brothers, she threw it angrily into the fire, where it was quickly consumed, and Meleager expired at the same time — Ovid, Metaph. viii. 4

The fatal brand Althæa burned
Shakespeare 2 Henry IV act i. sc. 1 (1591)

(Shakespeare says 2 Henry IV act ii. sc. 2), Althæa dreamt "she was delivered of a fire-brand." This is a mistake. It was Hebe who so dreamt. The story of Althæa and the fire-brand is given above.)

Althea (The divine), of Richard Lovelace, was Lucy Sacheverell, called by the poet, Lucetta

When love with unconfin'd wings
Flowers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whelp me at my gates.

(The "grutes" here referred to were those of a prison in which Lovelace was confined by the Long Parliament, for his petition from Kent in favour of the king.)

Altisido'ra, one of the duchess's servants, who pretends to be in love with don Quixote, and serenades him. The don sings his response that he has no other love than what he gives to his Dulcinea, and while he is still singing he is assailed by a string of cats, let into the room by a rope. As the knight was leaving the mansion, Altisidora accused him of having stolen her garters, but when the knight denied the charge, the damsel protested that she said so in her distraction, for her garters were not stolen. "I am like the man," she said, "looking for his mule at the time he was astride its back." — Cervantes, Don Quixote, II. iii. 9, etc., iv. 5 (1615)

Al'ton (Miss), alias Miss CLIFFORD, a sweet, modest young lady, the companion of Miss Alscrip, "the heiress," a vulgar, conceited parvenue. Lord Gayville is expected to marry "the heiress," but detests her, and loves Miss Alton, her humble companion. It turns out that £2000 a year of "the heiress's" fortune belongs to Mr. Clifford (Miss Alton's brother), and is by him settled on his sister. Sir Clement Flint destroys this bond, whereby the money returns to Clifford, who marries lady Emily Gayville, and sir Clement settles the same on his nephew, lord Gayville, who marries Miss Alton — General Burgoyne, The Henness (1781)

Al'ton Locke, tailor and poet, a novel by the Rev. Charles Kingsley (1850). This novel won for the author the title of "The Chartist Clergyman."

Alzin'do, king of Trem'izen, in Africa, overthrown by Orlando in his march to join the allied army of Ag'r'mant — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Amadis of Gaul, a love-child of king Perion and the princess Eli'e'na. He is the hero of a famous prose romance of chivalry, the first four books of which are attributed to Lobeira, of Portugal (died 1403). These books were translated into Spanish in 1460 by Montalvo, who added the fifth book. The five were rendered into French by Herberay, who increased the series to twenty-four books. Lastly, Gilbert Saurer added seven more volumes, and called the entire series Le Roman des Romans.

Whether Amadis was French or British is disputed. Some maintain that "Gaul" means Wales, not France, that Eli'e'na was princess of Brittany (Bretagne), and that Perion was king of Gaul (Wales). An Italian version by Bernardo Tasso, 1560.

Amadis de Gaul was a tall man of a fair complexion, his aspect something between mild and austere and had a handsome black beard. He was a person of very few words, was not easily provoked, and was soon appeased. — Cervantes, Don Quixote II. i. 1 (1615)

As Arthur is the central figure of British romance, Charlemagne of French, and Diderich of German, so Amadis is the central figure of Spanish and Portuguese romance, but there is this difference — the tale of Amadis is a connected whole, terminating with his marriage with Ori'na, the intervening parts being only the obstacles he encountered and overcame in obtaining this consummation. In the Arthurian romances, and those of the Charlemagne series, we have a number of adventures of different heroes, but there is no unity of purpose, each set of adventures is complete in itself.

(Southey the poet has an admirable abridgment of Amadis of Gaul, and also of Palmerin of England.)

Amadis of Greece, a supplemental part of Amadis of Gaul, by Felicien de

Longfellow, by a strange error, crowns the angel of death with amaranth, with which (as Milton says) "the spirits elect bind their resplendent locks," and his angel of life he crowns with asphodel, the flower of Pluto or the grave

Longfellow "The Two Angels"

Am'aranth (Lady), in Wild Oats, by John O'Keefe, a famous part of Mrs Pope (1740-1797)

Amarillis, a shepherdess in love with Perigot (t sounded), but Perigot loved Amoret. In order to break off this affection, Amaris induced "the sullen shepherd" to dip her in "the magic well," whereby she became transformed into the perfect resemblance of her rival, and soon effectually disgusted Perigot with her bold and wanton conduct. When afterwards he met the true Amoret, he repulsed her, and even wounded her with intent to kill. Ultimately, the trick was discovered by Corin, "the faithful shepherdess," and Perigot was married to his true love—John Fletcher, The Faithful Shepherd (1610)

Amaryllis, in Spenser's pastoral Colin Clout's Come Home Again, is the countess of Derby. Her name was Alice, and she was the youngest of the six daughters of sir John Spenser, of Althorpe, ancestor of the noble houses of Spenser and Marlborough. After the death of the earl, the widow married sir Thomas Egerton, keeper of the Great Seal (afterwards baron of Illesmere and viscount Brackley). It was for this very lady, during her widowhood, that Milton wrote his Ar'cades (3 syl.)

No less praiseworthy are the sisters three
The honour o' the noble family
Of which I meanest bore myself to be
Phyllis, Charyllis and sweet Amaryllis
Phyllis the fair is eldest o' the three
The next to her is bountiful Charyllis
But Amaryllis highest in degree.

Am'asis, Amōsis, or Aah'mes (3 syl.), founder of the eighteenth Egyptian dynasty (n.c. 1610). Lord Brooke attributes to him one of the pyramids. The three chief pyramids are usually ascribed to Suphis (or Cheops), Sen-Suphis (or Cephrenes), and Mencherēs, all of the fourth dynasty.

Amaurots (The), a people whose kingdom was invaded by the Dipsodes (2 syl.), but Pantagruel, coming to their defence, utterly routed the invaders—Rabelais, Pantagruel, ii. (1533)

Ama'via, the personification of Intemperance in grief. Hearing that her husband, sir Mordant, had been enticed to the Bower of Bliss by the enchantress Acris, she went in quest of him, and found him so changed in mind and body she could scarcely recognize him, however, she managed by tact to bring him away, but he died on the road, and Ama'via stabbed herself from excessive grief—Spenser, Fairy Queen, ii. 1 (1590)

Amazo'na, a fairy, who freed a certain country from the Ogrs and the Blue Centaur. When she sounded her trumpet, the sick were recovered and became both young and strong. She gave the princess Carpillona a bunch of gilliflowers, which enabled her to pass unrecognized before those who knew her well—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("The Princess Carpillona," 1682)

Amazo'mian Chin, a beardless chin, like that of the Amazonian women. Especially applied to a beardless young soldier.

When with his Amazonian chin he drove

Amber, said to be a concretion of birds' tears, but the birds were the sisters of Meleager, called Meleag'rides, who never ceased weeping for their dead brother—Pliny, Natural History, xxxvii. 2, 11.

Around thee shall glisten the loveliest amber
That e'er the sorrowing birds have wept.
T. Moore Fire Worshippers

Am'brose (2 syl.), a sharper, who assumed in the presence of Gil Blas the character of a devout. He was in league with a fellow who assumed the name of don Raphael, and a young woman who called herself Camilla, cousin of donna Mencía. These three sharpeners allure Gil Blas to a house which Camilla says is hers, fleece him of his ring, his portmanteau, and his money, decamp, and leave him to find out that the house is only a hired lodging—Lesage, Gil Blas, i 16, 16 (1715).

Ambrose (2 syl), an old domestic who waited on Miss Scraphine and Miss Angelica Arthuret—Sir W Scott, Red-goutlet, ch xv (time, George II.)

Ambrose (Brother), a monk who attended the prior Aymer, of Jorvaulx Abbey—Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.)

Ambrose (Father), abbot of Kennaquhair, is Edward Glendinning, brother of sir Halbert Glendinning (the knight of Avenel). He appears at Kinross, disguised as a nobleman's retainer—Sir W Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Amelia, a model of conjugal affection, in Fielding's novel so called. It is said that the character was modelled from his own wife. Dr Johnson read this novel from beginning to end without once stopping.

Amelia is perhaps the only book of which being printed off belies one morning a new edition was called for before night. The character of Amelia is the most pleasing heroine of all the romances.—Dr Johnson.

Amelia, in Thomson's Seasons, a beautiful, innocent young woman, overtaken by a storm while walking with her troth-plight lover, Celadon, "with equal virtue formed, and equal grace. Hers the mild lustre of the blooming morn, and his the radiance of the risen day." Amelia grew frightened, but Celadon said, "'Tis safety to be near thee, sure," when a flash of lightning struck her dead in his arms—"Summer" (1727).

America Names of the United States, whence derived—

Alabama, an Indian word, meaning "Here we rest." It was the exclamation of an Indian chief, and alluded to its well-stocked hunting-grounds.

Annapolis (Maryland), so named from queen Anne, in whose reign it was constituted the seat of local government.

Astoria (Oregon), so called from Mr Astor, merchant, of New York, who founded here a fur-trading station in 1811. The adventure of this merchant forms the subject of Washington Irving's Astoria.

Baltimore (3 syl), in Maryland, is so called from lord Baltimore, who led a colony to that state in 1634.

Boston (Massachusetts), so called from Boston in Lincolnshire, whence many of the original founders emigrated.

Carolina (North and South), named in compliment to Carolus II (Charles II.), who granted the whole country to eight needy courtiers.

Carson City (Oregon), commemorates the name of Kit Carson, the Rocky Mountain trapper and guide, who died in 1871.

Charleston (S Carolina), founded in 1670, and named after Charles II.

Delaware (3 syl), in Pennsylvania, is the name of an Indian tribe with whom William Penn chiefly negotiated.

Florida, discovered by the Spaniards on Palm Sunday, and thence called [Pasqua] Florida.

Georgia, named in honour of George II, in whose reign the first settlement there was made.

Harrisburg (Pennsylvania), named from Mr Harris, by whom it was first settled in 1733, under a grant from the Penn family.

Indiana, so named from the number of Indians which dwelt there (1801).

Louisiana, so named by M de la Sale (1682), in honour of Louis XIV of France.

Maine so called (1638) from the French province of the same name.

Maryland, so named by lord Baltimore (1633), in compliment to Henrietta-Maria, the wife of Charles I of England.

Nevada, so called from the Sierra Nevada mountain-chain.

New Hampshire, previously called Lacoma. It received its present name from J Mason, governor of Hampshire, to whom it was conceded in 1629.

New Jersey, so called in honour of sir G Carteret, who had defended Jersey against the parliamentary forces in 1664.

New York, previously called New Amsterdam. It received its present name (1661) in compliment to James duke of York (afterwards James II.)

Pennsylvania ("the Penn Forest"), so called from William Penn, who, in 1681, gave to the state its constitution.

Texas (i.e. "the place of protection"), so called in 1817, because general Lalle-mant gave there "protection" to a colony of French refugees

Vermont (i.e. "Verts Monts"), so called from the Green Mountains, which traverse the state

Virginia, so called (1584) by sir Walter Raleigh, in compliment to Elizabeth, "the virgin queen"

Am'giad, son of Camaralzaman and Badour, and half-brother of Assad (son of Camaralzaman and Hurrat'nefons) Each of the two mothers conceived a base passion for the other's son, and when the young princes revolted at their advances, accused them to their father of designs upon their honour Camaralzaman ordered his emir Giondar to put them both to death, but as the young men had saved him from a lion he had no hand on them, but told them not to return to their father's dominions They wandered on for a time, and then parted, but both reached the same place, which was a city of the Magi Here by a strange adventure Amgiad was made vizier, while Assad was thrown into a dungeon, where he was designed as a sacrifice to the fire-god Bosta'na, a daughter of the old man who imprisoned Assad, released him, and Amgiad out of gratitude made her his wife After which the king, who was greatly advanced in years, appointed him his successor, and Amgiad used his best efforts to abolish the worship of fire and establish "the true faith"—Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and Assad")

Amhara, the kingdom in which was the "happy valley," where the Abyssinian princes were doomed to live The valley was encompassed by mountains, and had but one entrance, which was under a cavern, concealed by woods and closed by iron gates—Dr Johnson Rasselas (1759)

Am'ias, a squire of low degree, beloved by Amilia They agreed to meet at a given spot, but on their way thither both were taken captives—Amias by Corlambo, and Amilia by a man monster Amilia was released by Belphebe (3 syl), who slew "the cuttiff," and Amias by prince Arthur, who slew Corlambo The two lovers were then brought together by the prince "in peace and settled rest"—Spenser, Fairy Queen, iv 7, 9 (1596) (See PALANA)

Am'idas, the younger brother of Brac'idas, sons of Mile'sio, the former in love with the dowerless Lucy, and the latter with the wealthy Philtra The two brothers had each an island of equal size and value left them by their father, but the sea daily added to the island of the younger brother, and enroached on that belonging to Bracidas When Philtra saw that the property of Amidas was daily increasing, she forsook the elder brother and married the wealthier, while Lucy, seeing herself jilted, throw herself into the sea A floating chest attracted her attention, she clung to it, and was drifted to the wasted island It was found to contain great riches, and Lucy gave its contents and herself to Bracidas Amidas claimed the chest as his own by right, and the question in dispute was submitted to sir Ar'tegal The wise arbiter decided, that whereas Amidas claimed as his own all the additions given to his island by the sea, Lucy might claim as her own the chest, because the sea had given it to her—Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 4 (1596)

Am'iel, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for sir Edward Seymour, Speaker of the House of Commons—(2 Sam xxi 34)

PART I.

A'min (Prince), son of the caliph Haroun-ul-Raschid, he married Am'inê, sister of Zobeide (3 syl), the caliph's wife—Arabian Nights Entertainments ("The History of Amine")

Am'ina, an orphan, who walked in her sleep. She was betrothed to Elvino, a rich farmer, but being found the night before the wedding in the chamber of count Rodolpho, Elvino looked upon her as a harlot. The count remonstrated with the young farmer, and while they were talking, the orphan was seen to get out of a window and walk along the narrow edge of a mill-roof while the great wheel was rapidly revolving, she then crossed a crazy old bridge, and came into the same chamber. Here she awoke, and, seeing Elvino, threw her arms around him so lovingly, that all his doubts vanished, and he married her—Bellini, La Sonnambula (an opera, 1831)

Am'ine (3 syl), half-sister of Zobeide (3 syl), and wife of Amin, the caliph's son. One day she went to purchase a robe, and the seller told her he would charge nothing if she would suffer him to kiss her cheek. Instead of kissing he bit it, and Amine, being asked by her husband how she came by the wound, so shuffled in her answers that he commanded her to be put to death, a sentence he afterwards commuted to scourging. One day she and her sister told the stories of their lives to the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, when Amin became reconciled to his wife, and the caliph married her half-sister—Arabian Nights Entertainments ("History of Zobeide and History of Amine")

Am'ine (3 syl) or Am'ines (3 syl), the beautiful wife of Sidi Nouman. Instead of eating her rice with a spoon, she used a bodkin for the purpose, and carried it to her mouth in infinitesimal portions. This went on for some time, till Sidi Nouman determined to ascertain on what his wife really fed, and to his horror discovered that she was a ghoul, who went stealthily by night to the cemetery, and feasted on the fresh-buried dead—Arabian Nights ("History of Sidi Nouman")

One of the Am'ines' sort, who pick up their grains of food with a bodkin.—O W Holmes Author of the Breakfast Table.

Amin'tor, a young nobleman, the troth-plight husband of Aspatia, but by the king's command he marries Exadne (3 syl). This is the great event of the tragedy of which Amintor is the hero. The sad story of Exadne, the heroine, gives name to the play—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Maid's Tragedy (1610)

Amis the Priest, the hero of a comic German story in verse of the thirteenth century. He is an Englishman, whose popularity excites the envy of the higher clergy, so they try to depose him on the score of ignorance. Being brought before them, they ask him such questions as these "How many days is it since Adam was placed in paradise?" but Amis fools them with his wit. The poem reminds one of the Abbot of Canterbury, and the Abbe de St Gall—Stricker of Austria

Am'let (Richard), the gamester in Vanbrugh's Confederacy (1695). He is usually called "Dick."

Mrs Am'et, a rich, vulgar tradeswoman, mother of Dick, of whom she is very proud although she calls him a "sad scapgrace," and swears "he will be hanged." At last she settles on him £10,000, and he marries Corinna, daughter of Gripe the rich scrivener.

Ammonian Horn (The), the cornucopia. Ammon king of Lib'na gave to his mistress Amalthe'a (mother of Bacchus) a tract of land resembling a ram's horn in shape, and hence called the "Ammonian horn" (from the giver), the "Amalthe'an horn" (from the receiver), and the "Hesperian horn" (from its locality). Almatha also personifies fertility.

Amoretta or Am'oret, twin-born with Belphe'or (3 s. l.), their mother being Chrysogone (1 s. l.) While the mother and her two babes were asleep, Dana took one (Belphe'or) to bring up, and Venus the other Venus committed Amoretta to the charge of Psyche (2 s. l.), and Psyche tended her as lovingly as she tended her own daughter Pleasure. "to whom she became the companion" When grown to marriageable estate, Amoretta was brought to Fairland, and wounded many a heart, but gave her own only to Sir Scudamore (bk. iii. 6) Being seized by Bu sirane, an enchanter, she was kept in darkness by him because she would not "her true love deny," but Britomart delivered her and bound the enchanter (bk. iii. 11, 12), after which she became the tender, loving wife of Sir Scudamore

Amoret is the type of female loveliness and wisely affection, soft, warm, chaste, gentle, and ardent, not sensual nor yet platonic, but that living, breathing, warm-hearted love which fits woman for the fond mother and faithful wife—Spenser, Fairy Queen, iii. (1590)

Am'oret, a modest, faithful shepherdess, who plighted her troth to Perigot (it sounded) at the "Virtuous Well" The various shepherdesses Amantilla having to enchantment assumed her appearance and dress, so disgusted Perigot with her bold rave, that he lost his love for the true Amoret, repulsed her with indignation, and tried to kill her The deception was revealed by Corin "the faithful shepherdess," and the lovers being reconciled, were happily married—John Fletcher, The Faithful Shepherdess (before 1611)

Amphitryon, a Theban general, husband of Alcmena (3 s. l.) While Amphitryon was absent at war with Pterelas king of the Telchians, Jupiter assumed his form, and visited Alcmena, who in due time became the mother of Hercules Next day Amphitryon returned having slain Pterelas, and Alcmena was surprised to see him so soon again Here a great entanglement arose, Alcmena telling her husband he visited her last night, and showing him the ring he gave her and Amphitryon declaring he was with the army This confusion is still further increased by his slave Sosia, who went to take to Alcmené the news of victory, but was stopped at the door of the house by Mercury who had assumed for the nonce Sosia's form, and the slave could not make out whether he was himself or not. Am'urath III sixth emperor of the Turks. He succeeded his father, Selim II, and reigned 1574-1595. His first act was to invite all his brothers to a banquet, and strangle them. Henry IV alludes to this when he says—

This is the English not the Turkish court
Not Amurath an Amurath succeeds,
But Harry Harry
Shakespeare 2 Henry IV, act v sc. 2 (1593)

Amusements of Kings. The great amusement of Arctas of Arabia Petrea, was currying horses, of Artabanus of Persia, was mole-catching, of Domitian of Rome, was catching flies, of Ferdinand VII of Spain, was embroidering petticoats, of Louis XVI clock and locket making, of George IV the game of patience

Amyn'tas, in Colin Clout's Come Home Again, by Spenser, is Ferdinando earl of Derby, who died 1594

Amyn'tas flower of shepherd's pride forlorn

Anacharsis [Cloutz] Baron Jean Baptiste Cloutz assumed the prenome of Anacharsis, from the Scythian so called who travelled about Greece and other countries to gather knowledge and improve his own countrymen. The baron wished by the name to intimate that his own object in life was like that of Anacharsis (1755-1794)

Anachronisms (See ERRORS)

CHALCER, in his tale of Troilus, at the siege of Troy, makes Pandarus refer to Robin Hood

And to hims life ful soberly he taled,
From basellwood there jolly Robin played.
Book v

GILES FLETCHER, in Christ's Victory, pt ii makes the Tempter seem to be "a good old hermit or palmer, travelling to see some saint, and telling his beads!!"

LORD, in The True Tragedies of Marius and Sylla (1594), mentions "the razer of Palermo" and "St Paul's steeple," and introduces Frenchmen who "for forty crowns" undertake to poison the Roman consul

MORGLAY makes Dido tell Æneas that she should have been contented with a son, even "if he had been a cockney dandiprat" (1582)

SCHILLER, in his Piccolomini, speaks of lightning conductors. This was about 150 years before they were invented.

SHAKESPEARE, in his Coriolanus (act ii sc 1), makes Menenius refer to Galen above 600 years before he was born.

Cominus alludes to Roman plays, but no such things were known for 250 years after the death of Cominus — Coriolanus, act ii sc 2.

Brutus refers to the "Mæcan waters brought to Rome by Censorinus." This was not done till 300 years afterwards.

In Hamlet, the prince Hamlet was educated at Wittenberg School, which was not founded till 1502, whereas Saxo-Germanicus, from whom Shakespeare borrowed the tale, died in 1204. Hamlet was 30 years old when his mother talks of his going back to school (act i sc 2).

In Henry IV the carrier complains that "the turkeys in his panner are quite starved" (act ii sc 5), whereas turkeys came from America, and the New World was not even discovered for a century after. Again in Henry V Gower is made to say to Fluellen, "Here comes Pistol, swelling like a turkey-cock" (act v sc 1).

In Julius Caesar, Brutus says to Cassius, "Perce, count the clock." To which Cassius replies, "The clock has stricken three." Clocks were not known to the Romans, and striking-clocks were not invented till some 1400 years after the death of Cæsar.

VIRGIL places Æneas in the port Velinus, which was made by Curius Dentatus.

This list with very little trouble might be greatly multiplied. The hotbed of anachronisms is mediæval romance, there nations, times, and places are most recklessly disregarded. This may be instanced by a few examples from Ariosto's great poem Orlando Furioso.

Here we have Charlemagne and his paladins joined by Edward king of England, Richard earl of Warwick, Henry duke of Clarence, and the dukes of York and Gloucester (bk vi). We have cannons employed by Cymoseco king of Friza (bk iv), and also in the siege of Paris (bk vi). We have the Moors established in Spain, whereas they were not invited over by the Saracens for nearly 300 years after Charlemagne's death. In bk xvii we have Prester John, who died in 1202, and in the last three books we have Constantine the Great, who died in 337.

Anacreon, the prince of erotic and bacchanalian poets, inasmuch that songs on these subjects are still called Anacreontic (B.C. 563-478).

Androclus and the Lion Androclus was a runaway Roman slave, who took refuge in a cavern A lion entered, and instead of tearing him to pieces, lifted up its forepaw that Androclus might extract from it a thorn The fugitive, being subsequently captured, was doomed to fight with a lion in the Roman arena, and it so happened that the very same lion was let out against him, it instantly recognized its benefactor, and began to fawn upon him with every token of gratitude and joy The story being told of this strange behaviour, Androclus was forthwith set free

A somewhat similar anecdote is told of Sir George Davis, English consul at Florence at the beginning of the present century One day he went to see the lions of the great duke of Tuscany There was one which the keepers could not tame, but no sooner did Sir George appear, than the beast manifested every symptom of joy Sir George entered the cage, when the creature leaped on his shoulder, licked his face, wagged its tail, and fawned like a dog Sir George told the great duke that he had brought up this lion, but as it grew older it became dangerous, and he sold it to a Barbary captain The duke said he bought it of the same man, and the mystery was cleared up

Andromache [An drom' a / 17], widow of Hector At the downfall of Troy both she and her son Astyanax were allotted to Pyrrhus king of Epirus, and Pyrrhus fell in love with her, but she repelled his advances At length a Grecian embassy, led by Orestes son of Agamemnon, arrived, and demanded that Astyanax should be given up and put to death, lest in manhood he should attempt to avenge his father's death Pyrrhus told Andromache that he would protect her son in defiance of all Greece if she would become his wife, and she reluctantly consented thereto While the marriage ceremonies were going on the ambassadors rushed on Pyrrhus and slew him, but as he fell he placed the crown on the head of Andromache, who thus became the queen of Epirus, and the ambassadors hastened to their ships in flight—Ambrose Philips, The Distressed Mother (1712)

Angels' Visits. Norris of Bemerton (1657-1711) wrote—those joys which

Soonest take their flight
Are the most exquisite and strong
Like angels visits short and bright.

Robert Blair, in 1743, wrote in his poem called The Grave, "in visits"

Like thro' of angels short and far between

Campbell, in 1799, appropriated the simile, but without improving it, wrote—

Like angels visits, few and far between

Angelica, in Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato (1495), is daughter of Gal'aphron king of Cathay. She goes to Paris, and Orlando falls in love with her, forgetful of wife, sovereign, country, and glory. Angelica, on the other hand, disregards Orlando, but passionately loves Rinaldo, who positively dislikes her. Angelica and Rinaldo drink of certain fountains, when the opposite effects are produced in their hearts, for then Rinaldo loves Angelica, while Angelica loses all love for Rinaldo

Angelica, in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, (1516) is the same lady, who marries Medoro, a young Moore, and returns to Cathay, where Medoro succeeds to the crown. As for Orlando, he is driven mad by jealousy and pride

Angelica (The princess), called "The Lady of the Golden Tower". The loves of Parismenos and Angelica form an important feature of the second part of Parismus Prince of Bohemia, by Emanuel Foord (1598)

Angelica, an heiress with whom Valentine Legend is in love. For a time he is unwilling to declare himself because of his debts, but Angelica gets possession of a bond for £4000, and tears it. The money difficulty being adjusted, the marriage is arranged amicably.—W Congreve, Love for Love (1695)

(Mrs Anne Bracegirdle) equally delighted in melting tenderness and playful coquetry in Sittara or Milla mant and even at an advanced age when she played Angelica.—C Dibden

Angelica, the troth-plight wife of Valere, "the gamester". She gives him a picture, and enjoins him not to part with it on pain of forfeiting her hand. However, he loses it in play, and Angelica in disguise is the winner of it. After much tribulation, Valere is cured of his vice, and the two unhappily united by marriage.—Mrs Centlivre, The Gamester (1705)

Angelina, daughter of lord Lewis, in the comedy called The Elder Brother, by Beaumont and Fletcher (1637)

Angelina, daughter of don Charino. Her father wanted her to marry Clodio, a coxcomb, but she preferred his elder brother Carlos, a bookworm, with whom she eloped. They were taken captives and carried to Lisbon. Here in due time they met, the fathers who went in search of them came to the same spot, and as Clodio had engaged himself to Elvira of Lisbon, the testy old gentlemen agreed to the marriage of Angelina with Carlos.—C Cibber, Love Makes a Man

Angelique (3 syl), daughter of Argan thermaladeimaginaire. Her lover is Cleante

(2 syl) In order to prove whether his wife or daughter loved him the better, Argan pretended to be dead, whereupon the wife rejoiced greatly that she was relieved of a "disgusting creature," hated by every one, but the daughter grieved as if her heart would break, rebuked herself for her shortcomings, and vowed to devote the rest of her life in prayer for the repose of his soul. Argan, being assured of his daughter's love, gave his free consent to her marriage with Cleante — Molière, Malade Imaginaire (1673)

Angelique, the aristocratic wife of George Dandin, a French commoner. She has a husband with a M. Chitandre, but always contrives to turn the tables on her husband. George Dandin first hears of a rendezvous from one Lubin, a foolish servant of Chitandre, and has the affair before M. and Mde. Sotenville, his wife's parents. The baron with George Dandin calls on the lover, who denies the accusation, and George Dandin has to beg pardon. Subsequently, he catches his wife and Chitandre together, and sends at once for M. and Mde. Sotenville, but Angelique, aware of their presence, pretends to denounce her lover, and even takes up a stick to beat him for the "insult offered to a virtuous wife," so again the parents declare their daughter to be the very paragon of women. Lastly, George Dandin detects his wife and Chitandre together at night-time, and succeeds in shutting his wife out of her room, but Angelique now pretends to kill herself, and when George goes for a light to look for the body, she rushes into her room and shuts him out. At this crisis the parents arrive, when Angelique accuses her husband of being out all night in a debrueh, and he is made to beg her pardon on his knees — Molière, George Dandin (1668)

An'gelo, in Measure for Measure, lord deputy of Vienna in the absence of Vincentio the duke. His betrothed lady is Maria'na. Lord Angelo conceived a base passion for Isabella, sister of Claudio, but his designs were foiled by the duke, who compelled him to marry Mariana — Shakespeare (1603)

An'gelo, a gentleman, friend to Julio in The Captain, a drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (1613)

Anger the Alphabet. It was Athenodorus the Stoic who advised

Augustus to repeat the alphabet when he felt inclined to give way to anger.

Un certain Grec dit à l'empereur Auguste
Comme une instruction utile autant que juste
Que lorsqu'une aventure en colère nous met
Nous devons avant tout dire notre alphabet,
Afin que dans ce temps là bile se tempère
Et qu'on ne fasse rien que l'on ne doive faire
Molière J. Les Femmes II. 4 (1662)

Angiolina (1 syl), daughter of Loredano, and the young wife of Marino Faliero, the doge of Venice. A patrician named Michel Steno, having behaved indecently to some of the women assembled at the great civic banquet given by the doge, was kicked out of the house by order of the doge, and in revenge wrote some scurrilous lines against the dogress. This insult was referred to "The Lords," and Steno was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, which the doge considered a very inadequate punishment for the offence — Byron, Marino Faliero

The character of the calm, pure-spirited Angiolina is developed most admirably. The great difference between her temper and that of her fiery husband is well portrayed, but not less vividly touched is her strong bond of union with exists in the common nobleness of their deep natures. There is no spark of jealousy in the old man's thought. He does not expect the fervour of youthful passion in his young wife, but he finds what is far better — the fearless confidence of one so innocent that she can scarcely believe in the existence of guilt. — How it looks Steno's greatest punishment will be the blushing of his privacy. — Lockhart.

Anglan'te's Lord, Orlando, who was lord of Anglantic and knight of Brava — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

An'glescy, i.e. Angles eh-land (the island of the English). Laid in king of Northumberland "warred with them that dwell in the Isle of Mona, and they became his servants, and the island was no longer called Mona, but Anglesey, the isle of the English."

An'glides (3 syl), wife of good prince Boudwine (2 syl), brother to sir Mark king of Cornwall ("the falsest traitor that ever was born"). When king Mark slew her husband, Anglides and her son Alisaunder made their escape to Magouneo (i.e. Arundel), where she lived in peace, and brought up her son till he received the honour of knighthood — Sir T. Malory, Hist. of Pr. Arthur, ii. 117, 118 (1470)

An'glo-ma'nia, generally applied to a French or German imitation of the manners, customs, etc., of the English. It prevailed in France some time before the first Revolution, and was often extremely ridiculous.

Annir, king of Inis-thona (an island of Scandinavia). He had two sons (Argon and Ruro) and one daughter. One day Cormalo, a neighbouring chief, came and begged the honour of a tournament. Argon granted the request, and overthrew him, which so vexed Cormalo that during a hunt he shot both the brothers secretly with his bow. Their dog Ruro ran to the palace, and howled so as to attract attention, whereupon Annir followed the hound, and found both his sons dead, and on his return he further found that Cormalo had carried off his daughter Oscar, son of Ossian, led an army against the villain, and slew him, then liberating the young lady, he took her back to Inis-thona, and delivered her to her father — Ossian ("The War of Inis-thona")

Anselme (2 syl), father of Valère (2 syl) and Marianne (3 syl). In reality he is don Thomas d'Alburei, of Naples. The family were exiled from Naples for political reasons, and being shipwrecked were all parted. Valère was picked up by a Spanish captain, who adopted him, Marianne fell into the hands of a corsair, who kept her a captive for ten years, when she effected her escape, and Anselme wandered from place to place for ten years, when he settled in Paris, and intended to marry. At the expiration of sixteen years they all met in Paris at the house of Harpagon, the miser. Valère was in love with Elise (2 syl), the miser's daughter, promised by Harpagon in marriage to Anselme, and Marianne, affianced to the miser's son Cléante (2 syl), was sought in marriage by Harpagon, the old father. As soon as Anselme discovered that Valère and Marianne were his own children, matters were soon amicably arranged, the young people married, and the old ones retired from the unequal contest — Moliere, L'Avare (1667)

Anselmo, a noble cavalier of Florence, the friend of Lothario. Anselmo married Camilla, and induced his friend to try to corrupt her, that he might rejoice in her incorruptible fidelity. Lothario unwillingly undertook the task, and succeeded but too well for a time

Anselmo was deceived, but at length Camilla eloped, and the end of the silly affair was that Anselmo died of grief, Lothario was slain in battle, and Camilla died in a convent — Cervantes, Don Quixote, I ii 5, 6, Fatal Curiosity (1605)

Ants lay up a store for the winter This is an error in natural history, as ants are torpid during the winter

Antæos, a gigantic wrestler of Libya (or Assa). His strength was inexhaustible so long as he touched the earth, and was renewed every time he did touch it. Hercules killed him by lifting him up from the earth and squeezing him to death (See MAIRGLR)

Antenor, a traitorous Trojan prince, related to Priam. He advised Ulysses to carry away the palladium from Troy, and when the wooden horse was built it was Antenor who urged the Trojans to make a breach in the wall and drag the horse into the city — Shakespeare has introduced him in Trionus and Cressida (1602)

Anth'a, the lady beloved by Abrocomas in the Greek romance called De Amoris Anthæ et Abrocomæ, by Xenophon of Ephesus, who lived in the fourth Christian century. (This is not Xenophon the historian, who lived B.C. 411-359)

nice," in Shakespeare's drama so called (1598) Anthonio borrows of Shylock, a Jew, 8000 ducats for three months, to lend to his friend Bassanio. The conditions of the loan were these: if the money was paid within the time, only the principal should be returned, but if not, the Jew should be allowed to cut from Anthonio's body "a pound of flesh." As the ships of Anthonio were delayed by contrary winds, he was unable to pay within the three months, and Shylock demanded the forfeiture according to the bond. Portia, in the dress of a law-doctor, conducted the case, and when the Jew was about to cut the flesh, stopped him, saying—(1) the bond gave him no drop of blood, and (2) he must take neither more nor less than an exact pound. If he shed one drop of blood or if he cut more or less than an exact pound, his life would be forfeit. As it was quite impossible to comply with these restrictions, the Jew was nonsuited, and had to pay a heavy fine for seeking the life of a citizen.

Antho'no, father of Protheus, and suitor of Julia—Shakespeare, The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594)

An'thony, an English archer in the cottage of farmer Dickson, of Douglassdale—Sir W. Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.)

An'thony, the old postillion at Meg Dods's, the landlady of the inn at St Ronan's Well—Sir W. Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III.)

Antid'rius, bishop of Jaen, martyred by the Vandals in 111. One day, seeing the devil writing in his pocket-book some sin committed by the pope, he jumped upon his back and commanded his Satanic majesty to carry him to Rome. The devil tried to make the bishop pronounce the name of Jesus, which would break the spell, and then the devil would have tossed his unwelcome burden into the sea, but the bishop only cried, "Gee np, devil!" and when he reached Rome he was covered with Alpine snow. The chronicler naïvely adds, "the hat is still shown at Rome in confirmation of this miracle"—General Chronicle of King Alphonso the Wise

Antig'one (4 syl), daughter of Ce'dipos and Jocas'tê, a noble maiden, with a truly heroic attachment to her father and brothers. When Ce'dipos had blinded himself, and was obliged to quit Thebes, Antigônê accompanied him, and remained with him till his death, when she returned to Thebes. Creon, the king, had forbidden any one to bury Polyn'cês, her brother, who had been slain by his elder brother in battle, but Antigônê, in defiance of this prohibition, buried the dead body, and Creon shut her up in a vault under ground, where she killed herself. Hæman, her lover, killed himself also by her side. Sophoclês has a Greek tragedy on the subject, and it has been dramatized for the English stage.

Then suddenly—oh! what a revelation of beauty! forth stepped, walking in brightness, the most faultless of Grecian marbles. Miss Helen Faucet as Antigônê. "What perfection of Athenian sculpture! the noble figure, the lovely, is the fluent draper! What an unrivalled of the statuesque! perfect in form, perfect in attitude."—De Quincey (1844)

Antig'onus, a Sicilian lord, commanded by king Leontês to take his infant daughter to a desert shore and leave her to perish. Antigonus was driven by a storm to the coast of Bohemia, where he left the babe, but on his way back to the ship, he was torn to pieces by a bear—Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale (1601)

Anty'onus (King), an old man with a young man's amorous passions. He is one of the four kings who succeeded to the divided empire of Alexander the Great—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Humorous Lieutenant (1647)

Antin'ous (1 syl), a page of Hadrian the Roman emperor, noted for his beauty.

Antin'ous (4 syl), son of Cas'silano (3 syl) general of Candy, and brother of An'nophel, in The Laves of Candy, a drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (1647)

Antio'chus, emperor of Greece, who sought the life of Per'icles prince of Tyre, but died without effecting his desire—Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608)

Antio'pe (4 syl), daughter of Idom'eneus (4 syl), for whom Telem'achus had a tendre. Mentor approved his choice, and assured Telemachus that the lady was designed for him by the gods.

Her charms were ' the glowing modesty of her countenance, her silent diffidence, and her sweet reserve, her constant attention to tapestry or to some other useful and elegant employment, her diligence in household affairs, her contempt of finery in dress, and her ignorance of her own beauty." Telemachus says, " She encourages to industry by her example, sweetens labour by the melody of her voice, and excels the best of painters in the elegance of her embroidery."—Penelope, Telemachus, xxii (1700)

He [Paris] fancied he had found in Virginia the wisdom of An'loph with the misfortunes and the tenderness of Es'har.—Bernardin de St. Pierre, Paul and Virginia (1787).

Antiph'olus, the name of two brothers, twins, the sons of Ægeon a merchant of Syracuse. The two brothers were shipwrecked in infancy, and, being picked up by different cruisers, one was carried to Syracuse, and the other to Ephesus. The Ephesian entered the service of the duke, and, being fortunate enough to save the duke's life, became a great man and married well. The Syracusan Antiph'olus, going in search of his brother, came to Ephesus, where a series of blunders occurs from the wonderful likeness of the two brothers and their two servants called Dromio. The confusion becomes so great that the Ephesian is taken up as a mad man. It so happened that both brothers appeared before the duke at the same time, and the extraordinary likeness being seen by all, the cause of the blunders was evident, and everything was satisfactorily explained.—Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors (1593)

Antiph'ony, alternate ringing of opposite choirs, as when psalms are intoned in cathedrals

Oh I never more for me shall winds intone
With all your tops a vast antiphony
Robert Browning, A Boy on the Scutcheon

Anton (Sir) Tennyson says that Merlin gave Arthur, when an infant, to sir Anton and his lady to bring up, and they brought him up as their own son. This does not correspond with the History of Prince Arthur which states that he was committed to the care of sir Ector and his lady, whose son, sir Key, is over and over again called the prince's foster-brother. The History furthermore states that Arthur made sir Key his senechal because he was his foster-brother.

So the child was delivered unto Merlin and he bare him forth unto sir Ector and he made a holy man christen him and named him Arthur. And so sir Ector's wife nourished him with her own breast.—Part I. 3.

So sir Ector rode to the Justs and with him rode sir Key his son and young Arthur that was his nourished brother.—Ibid.

Sir said sir Ector I will ask no more of you but that you will make my son if hev your foster brother senechal of all your lands. That shall be done" said Arthur (ch. 4) —Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470)

Anton one of Henry Smith's men in The Fan Maid of Perth, by sir W. Scott (time, Henry IV)

Anto'nad, the name of Cleopatra's ship at the battle of Actium, so named in compliment to Mark Antony—Plutarch

Anto'nio, a sea captain who saved Sebastian, the brother of Vi'ola, when wrecked off the coast of Illyria—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night (1614)

Anto'mo, the Swiss lad who acts as the guide from Lucern, in sir W. Scott's Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Anto'mo, a stout old gentleman, kinsman of Petrucchio, governor of Bologna—Berumont and Fletcher, The Chances (a comedy, before 1621)

Antonio (Don), father of Carlos a bookworm, and Clodio a cockcomb, a testy, headstrong old man. He wants Carlos to sign away his birthright in favour of his younger brother, to whom he intends Angelina to be married, but Carlos declines to give his signature, and elopes with Angelina, whom he marries, while Clodio engages his troth to Lil'ian of Lisbon—C. Cibber, Love Makes a Man

Antonio (Don), in love with Louisa, the daughter of don Jerome of Seville. A poor nobleman of ancient family—Sheridan, The Duenna (1778).

Antonomas'ia, (The princess), daughter of Archip'ula, king of Candayn, and his wife Maguncia. She married don Clavijo, but the giant Malambru'no, by enchantment, changed the bride into a brass monkey, and her spouse into a crocodile of some unknown metal. Don Quixote mounted the wooden horse Clavileno the Winged, to disenchant the lady and her husband, and this he effected "simply by making the attempt"—Cervantes, Don Quixote, II. iii 4, 5 (1615).

An'tony and Cæsar Macbeth says that "under Banquo his own genius was rebuked [or snubbed], as it is said Mark Antony's was by Cæsar" (act iii sc 1), and in Antony and Cleopatra this passage is elucidated thus—

Thy demons that stir thee, which keep thee, is Noble courageous high unmatch'd.
Where Cæsar, I do not know him, thy angel Becomes a fear as being overpowered.

Act II. c. 3.

An'vil (77. Literary) Dr Mayo was so called, because he bore the hardest blows of Dr Johnson without flinching

Aodh, last of the Culdees or primitive clergy of Iona, an island south of Staffa. His wife was Leuilu'ra. Ulfa'gre the Dane, having landed on the island and put many to the sword, bound Aodh in chains of iron, then dragging him to the church, demanded where the "treasures were concealed." A mysterious figure now appeared, which not only released the priest, but took the Dane by the arm to the statue of St. Columba, which fell on him and crushed him to death. After this the "saint" gathered the remnant of the islanders together, and went to Ireland.—Campbell, Pentlira

Aonian Mount (Tac.) in Bore'na, the haunt of the Muses. Milton says his Muse is to soar above "the Aonian mount," i. e. above the flight of fable and classic themes, because his subject was "Jehovah, lord of all"—Paradise Lost, i. 15 (1665)

Ape (1 s. l.), the pseudonym of M. Pellgrini, the caricaturist of Larry's Fun. Dr Johnson says "his art is to imitate leucorhœy," whence the adoption of the name

Apes. To lead Apes or He's, to die an old maid. Thus Fadlulnida says to Tatlanthe (3 v. 1)—

I, a man, who's never married, I am now
Found like a virgin and not married yet
O, how I wish, dear girl, you were my friend
I would have you be married to me and I
H. Carter, Chambers, etc. xii. (1871.)

Apelles and the Cobbler A cobbler found fault with the shoe-latchet of one of Apelles' paintings, and the artist rectified the fault. The cobbler, thinking himself very wise, next ventured to criticize the legs, but Apelles said, Ne scior supra crepidur ("Let not the cobbler go beyond his last.")

Within that range of criticism where all are equally judges, and where Crispin is entitled to dictate to Apelles.—Encyc. Brit. Art. Poemona.

Apelles When his famous painting of Venus rising out of the sea (hung by Augustus in the temple of Julius Cæsar) was greatly injured by time, Nero replaced it by a copy done by Dorotheus. This Venus by Apelles is called "Venus Anadrom'ene," his model (according to tradition) being Campaspe (afterwards his wife)

Apeman'tus, a churlish Athenian philosopher, who snarled at men systematically, but showed his cynicism to be mere affectation, when Timon attacked him with his own weapons.—Shakespeare, Timon of Athens (1600)

Timon affected melancholy showed like the cynicism of Apeman'tus contrasted with the real masculinity of Timon.—St. W. Scott

APICIUS, an epicure in the time of Tiberius. He wrote a book on the ways of provoking an appetite. Having spent £500,000 in supplying the delicacies of the table, and having only £80,000 left he hanged himself, not thinking it possible to exist on such a wretched pittance. APICIA, however, became a stock name for certain cakes and sauces, and his name is still proverbial in all matters of gastronomy

There was another of the name in the reign of Trajan who wrote a cooking book and manual of sauces

No Drabins read, because your calm more than I do.
Hutton and Apicius would have blushed for I. Mark An who who read each whole book for some, never mastered more a meal than you have done.—Cumber-Land, The Fashionable Lover, i. 11 (1871)

Apollo, the sun, in Homeric mythology is the embodiment of practical wisdom and foresight, of swift and far-reaching intelligence, and hence of poetry, music, etc.

The Apollo Belvidere, that is the Apollo preserved in the Belvidere gallery of the Vatican discovered in 1593 amidst the ruins of Antium and purchased by pope Julius II. It is supposed to be the work of Calamis, a Greek sculptor of the fifth century B.C.

The Apollo of Actium was a gigantic statue which served for a beacon

The Apollo of Rhodes, usually called the colossus, was a gigantic bronze statue, 150 feet high, made by Charès, a pupil of Lysippus, and set up B.C. 300

rustic of Domrémy, near Vaucouleurs, in France. She was servant at an inn when she conceived the idea of liberating France from the English. Having gained admission to Charles VII, she was sent by him to raise the siege of Orleans, and actually succeeded in so doing. Schuller has a tragedy on the subject, Casimir Delavigne an elegy on her, Southey an epic poem on her life and death, and Voltaire a burlesque.

In regard to her death, M. Octave Delepière, in his Doute Historique, denies the tradition of her having been burnt to death at Rouen, and Vignier discovered in a family muniment chest the "contract of marriage between" Robert des Armoise, knight, and Jeanne d'Arc, surnamed "The Maid of Orleans."

Arcades Ambo, both fools alike, both "sweet innocents," both alike eccentric. There is nothing in the character of Corydon and Thyrsis (Virgil's Eclogue, vii 4) to justify this disparaging application of the phrase. All Virgil says is they were both "in the flower of their youth, and both Arcadians, both equal in setting a theme for song or capping it epigrammatically," but as Arcadia was the least intellectual part of Greece, an "Arcadian" came to signify a dunce, and hence "Arcades ambo" received its present acceptation.

Arca'dia, a pastoral romance by Sir Philip Sidney, in imitation of the Diana of Montemayor (sixteenth century).

Arca'dus (4 syl), an enchanter who bound Amadis de Gaul to a pillar in his courtyard, and administered to him 200 stripes with his horse's bridle—Amadis de Gaul (fifteenth century).

Arca'nes (3 syl), a noble soldier, friend of Cas'silane (3 syl) general of Candy—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Laws of Candy (1647).

Archangel, Burroughs, the puritan preacher, called Cromwell "the archangel that did battle with the devil."

Archas, "the loyal subject" of the great duke of Moscovia, and general of the Moscovites. His son is colonel Theodore.

Young Archas, son of the general. Disguised as a woman, he assumes the name of Alinda—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Loyal Subject (1618).

Archbish'op of Grana'da told his secretary, Gil Blas, when he hired him, "Whenever thou shalt perceive my pen smack of old age and my genius flag don't fail to advertise me of it, for I don't trust to my own judgment, which may be seduced by self-love." After a fit of apoplexy, Gil Blas ventured in the most delicate manner to hint to his grace that "his last discourse had not altogether the energy of his former ones." To this the archbishop replied, "You are yet too raw to make proper distinctions. Know, child, that I never composed a better homily than that which you disapprove. Go, tell my treasurer to give you 100 ducats. Adieu, Mr Gil Blas, I wish you all manner of prosperity, with a little more taste."—Lesage, Gil Blas, vii 3 (1715).

Ar'cher (Francis), friend of Aimwell, who joins him in fortune-hunting. These are the two "berux." Thomas viscount Aimwell marries Dorinda, the daughter of lady Bountiful. Archer hands the deeds and property taken from the highwaymen to Sir Charles Freeman, who takes his sister, Mrs Sullen, under his charge again—George Farquhar, The Beaux' Stratagem (1707).

Arch'ibald (John), attendant on the duke of Argyle—Sir W. Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II).

Archima'go, the reverse of holiness, and therefore Satan the father of lies and all deception. Assuming the guise of the Red Cross Knight, he deceived Una, and under the guise of a hermit, he deceived the knight himself. Archimago is introduced in bks 1 and 11 of Spenser's Faery Queen. Spenser The Faery Queen I. ii. 10 (1590)

Ar'chy M'Sar'casm (Sir), "a proud Caledonian knight, whose tongue, like the dart of death, spares neither sex nor age. His insolence of family and licentiousness of wit gained him the contempt of every one" (i 1). Sir Archy tells Charlotte, "In the house of M'Sarcasm are two barons, three viscounts, six earls, one marquise, and two dukes, besides baronets and lairds oot o' a' reckoning" (i 1). He makes love to Charlotte Goodchild, but supposing it to be true that she has lost her fortune, declares to her that he has just received letters "frae the dukes, the marquise, and a' the dignitaries of the family expressly prohibiting his contaminating the blood of M'Sarcasm."

The man has something droll something ridiculous in him. His abominable Scotch accent his grotesque visage almost buried in snuff the roll of his eyes and twist of his mouth his strange inhuman laugh his tremendous periwig, and his manners altogether—why one might take him for a mountebank doctor at a Dutch fair—C MacKlin Love à la mode 1 1 (1779)

Sir Archy's Great-grandmother Sir Archy M'Sarcasm insisted on fighting sir Callaghan O'Brallaghan on a point of ancestry. The Scotchman said that the Irish are a colony from Scotland, "an ootcast, a mere ootcast." The Irishman retorted by saying that "one Mae Fergus O'Brallaghan went from Carrickfergus, and peopled all Scotland with his own hands." Charlotte [Goodehild] interposed, and asked the cause of the contention, whereupon sir Callaghan replied, "Madam, it is about sir Archy's great-grandmother"—C MacKlin, Love à la mode, 1 1 (1779)

We shall not now stay to quarrel about sir Archy's great grandmother—Macpherson Dissertation upon Ossian

Ar'cite (2 syl) and Pal'amon, two Theban knights, captives of duke Theus, who used to see from their dungeon window the duke's sister-in-law, Emily, taking her airing in the palace garden, and fell in love with her. Both captives having gained their liberty, contended for the lady by single combat. Arcite was victor, but being thrown from his horse was killed, and Emily became the bride of Palemon—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Knight's Tale," 1388)

Arctiens, the zodiacal sign called the Archer

Sunt Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo, Virgo, Libraque, Scorpius, Arcteneus, Capre, Amphora, Pisces.

Ar'den (Enoch), the hero of a poetic tale by Tennyson. He is a seaman wrecked on a desert island, who returns home after the absence of several years, and finds his wife married to another. Seeing her both happy and prosperous, Enoch resolves not to mar her domestic peace, so he leaves the place, and dies of a broken heart—Tennyson, Enoch Arden Ar'den of Fev'ersham, a noble character, honourable, forgiving, affectionate, and modest. His wife Alicia in her sleep reveals to him her guilty love for Mosby, but he pardons her on condition that she will never see the seducer again. Scarcely has she made the promise when she plots with Mosby her husband's murder. In a planned street-scuffle, Mosby pretends to take Arden's part, and thus throws him off his guard. Arden thinks he has wronged him, and invites him to his house, but Mosby conspires with two hired ruffians to fall on his host during a game of draughts, the right moment being signified by Mosby's saying, "Now I take you." Arden is murdered, but the whole gang is apprehended and brought to justice.

(This drama is based on a murder which took place in 1551. Ludwig Tieck has translated the play into German, as a genuine production of Shakespeare. Some ascribe the play to George Lillo, but Charles Lamb gives 1592 as the date of its production, and says the author is unknown.)

Ardenne (Water of) This water had the power of converting love to hate. The fountain was made by Merlin, to cure sir Tristram of his love for Isolte (but sir Tristram never drank of it). It is mentioned by Bojardo in Orlando Innamorato. Nepenthe (3 syl) had the contrary effect, viz, turning hatred to love. (See NEPENTHE)

Arethu'sa, daughter of the king Mess'na, in the drama called Phylaster or Love Lies a-bleeding, by Beaumont and Fletcher (1638)

Arcthusa, a nymph pursued by Apollo the river-god, and changed into a fountain in the island of Ortygia, but the river-god still pursued her, and mingled his stream with the fountain, and now, "like friends once parted grown single-hearted" they leap and flow and slumber together "like spirits that love but live no more"

* * This fable has been exquisitely turned into poetry by Percy B. Shelley (Alastor, 1820)

Arethuse (4 syl) a Syrian-run fountain, especially noted because the poet Thucydides was born on its banks. Milton alludes to it in his Lycidas, l. 85

Argalia, brother of Angelica, in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (1516)

Argan, the malin magicien and father of Angelique. He is introduced taxing his apothecary's bills, under the conviction that he cannot afford to be sick at the prices charged, but then he notices that he has already reduced his bills during the current month, and is not so well. He first acts upon the plan of marrying Angelique to a young doctor, but to this the lady objects. His brother suggests that Argan himself should be his own doctor, and when the invalid replies he has not studied either diseases, drugs, or Latin the objection is overruled by investing the 'malade' in a doctor's cap and robe. The piece concludes with the ceremonial in macaronic Latin.

* * * When Argan asks his doctor how many grains of salt he ought to eat with an egg, the doctor answers "Six, huit, dix etc., par les nombres pairs, comme dans les médicaments par les nombres impairs."—Molière, Le Malin Incurable, ii 9 (1673)

Argante (3 syl) a giantess called "the very monster and miracle of lust." She and her twin-brother Oliphant or Oliphant were the children of Ixion and Lethé. Argante used to carry off young men as her captive, and seized "the Squire of Dames" as one of her victims. The squire, who was in fact Britemart (the heroine of chastity) was delivered by sir Satyrane (3 syl)—Spenser, Fairy Queen, iii 7 (1599)

Argante (2 syl) father of Oetive (2 syl) and Zerbine (3 syl). He promises to give his daughter Zerbine to Leandre (2 syl), the son of his friend Geronte (2 syl), but during his absence abroad the young people fall in love unknown to their respective fathers. Both fathers storm, and threaten to break off the engagement, but are delighted beyond measure when they discover that the choice of the young people has unknowingly coincided with their own—Molière, Les Femmes de Son Air (1671)

(Thomas Otway has adapted this play to the English stage, and called it The City of Dreadful Night. "Argante" he calls "Geronte," "Geronte" is "Grip," "Zerbine" he calls "Lina" and "Leandre" he changes into "Leander")

Argante (3 syl) a Circassian of high rank and undoubted courage but fierce and a great deceiver of the Nazarenes. Argante and Soliman were undoubtedly the bravest heroes of the infidel host. Argante was slain by Rinaldo and Soliman by Tancred—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

Argente (3 syl) daughter of king Adelbright, and ward of Edel Curan a Danish prince in order to woo her, became a drudge in her house, but being obliged to quit her service, became a shepherd. Edel, the guardian forcing his suit on Argente, compelled her to flight and she became a shepherd's maid. In this capacity Curan wooed and won her. Edel was forced to restore the possessions of his ward and Curan became king of Northumberland. As for Edel, he was put to death—William Warner, Argente (1583)

Argentan (L'air d'été), one of the officers of the duke of Burgundy—Sir W. Scott, Anne of Gueldre (time Lawra IV)

Argillan, a haughty, turbulent knight, born on the banks of the Trent

He induced the Latians to revolt, was arrested, made his escape, but was ultimately slain in battle by Solomon — Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, VIII 12 (1575)

Argon and Ruro, the two sons of Annin king of Inis-thona, an island of Scandinavia. Cor'malo, a neighbouring chief, came to the island, and asked for the honour of a tournament. Argon granted the request, and overthrew him, and thus so vexed Cornalo that during a hunt he shot both the brothers with his bow. Their dog Inno, running to the hall, howled so as to attract attention, and Annin, following the hound, found his two sons both dead. On his return he discovered that Cornalo had run off with his daughter. Oseer, son of Ossian, slew Cornalo in flight, and restored the daughter to her father — Ossian ("The War of Inis-thona")

A'riel, in The Tempest, an airy spirit, able to assume any shape, or even to become invisible. He was enslaved to the witch Syc'orax, mother of Cal'iban, who overtasked the little thing, and in punishment for not doing what was beyond his strength, imprisoned him for twelve years in the rift of a pine tree, where Caliban delighted to torture him with unmitigated cruelty. Prospero, duke of Milan and father of Miranda, liberated Ariel from the pine-rift, and the grateful spirit served the duke for sixteen years, when he was set free

And like Ariel in the cloven pine tree

Longfellow The Golden Vlies one

A'riel, the sulph in Pope's Pope of the Foot. The impersonation of "fine life" in the abstract, the nice adjuster of hearts and necklaces. When disobedient he is punished by being kept hovering over the fumes of the chocolate, or is transfixed with pins, eleged with pomatums, or wedged in the eyes of bodilins

A'riel, one of the rebel angels. The word means "the Lion of God." Abdiel encountered him, and overthrew him — Milton, Paradise Lost, vi 571 (1667)

Ariman'es (4 syl), the prince of the powers of evil, introduced by Byron in his drama called Manfred. The Perseus recognized a power of good and a power of evil: the former Yesid, and the latter Ahrim (in Greek, Oromasdes and Ariman). The two spirits are ever at war with each other. Oromasdes created twenty-four good spirits, and enclosed them in an egg to be out of the power of Ariman's, but Ariman's pierced the shell, and thus mixed evil with every good. However, a time will come when Ariman's shall be subjected, and the earth will become a perfect paradise

Arimas'pians, a one-eyed people of Seythia, who adorned their hair with gold. As gold mines were guarded by Gryphons, there were perpetual contentions between the Arimaspians and the Gryphons (See Gryphon)

With fifteen companions he entered Granada, then in the power of the Moors, and nailed to the door of the principal mosque with his dagger a tablet inscribed "Ave Maria!" then galloped back, before the guards recovered from their amazement—Washington Irving, Conquest of Granada, 91

Aristophanes (5 syl), a Greek who wrote fifty-four comedies, eleven of which have survived to the present day (B.C. 444–380). He is called "The Prince of Ancient Comedy," and Menander "The Prince of New Comedy" (B.C. 342–291).

The English or Modern Aristophanes, Samuel Foote (1722–1777).

The French Aristophanes, J. Baptiste Poquelin de Molière (1622–1673).

Aristotle The mistress of this philosopher was Hepyllis, of Plato, Archionassa, and of Epicurus, Leontium.

Aristotle of China, Lehuhe, who died A.D. 1200, called "The Prince of Science."

Aristotle of Christianity, Thos. Aquinas, who tried to reduce the doctrines of faith to syllogistic formulæ (1224–1274).

Aristotle of the Nineteenth Century, George Currier, the naturalist (1769–1802).

Aristotle in Love Godfrey Gobylyve told sir Graunde Amoure that Aristotle the philosopher was once in love, and the lady promised to listen to his prayer if he would grant her request. The terms being readily accepted, she commanded him to go on all fours, and then, putting a bridle into his mouth, mounted on his back, and drove him about the room till he was so angry, weary, and disgusted, that he was quite cured of his foolish attachment—Stephen Hawes, The Pastime of Plesure, xxix (1555).

Aimado (Don Adriano de), a pompous, affected Spaniard, called "a refined traveller, in all the world's new fashion plumed, that had a mint of phrases in his brain. One whom the music of his own vain tongue did ravish." This man was chosen by Ferdinand, the king of Navarre, when he resolved to spend three years in study with three companions, to relate in the interim of his studies "in high-born words the worth of many a knight from tawny Spain lost in the world's debate."

His humour is lofty, his discourse peremptory, his tongue filed, his eye ambitious, his gait majestic and his general behaviour vain, ridiculous and thronical. He draweth out the thread of his verbosity finer than the staple of his argument.—Shakespeare Love's Labour's Lost act v. sc. 1 (1634).

Armande (2 syl), daughter of Chrysale (2 syl) and sister of Henriette. Armande is a femme savante, and Henriette a "thorough woman." Both love Clitandre, but Armande loves him platonically, while Henriette loves him with womanly affection. Clitandre prefers the younger sister, and after surmounting the usual obstacles, marries her—Molière, Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

Armida, a sorceress, who seduces Rinaldo and other crusaders from the siege of Jerusalem. Rinaldo is conducted by her to her splendid palace, where he forgets his vows, and abandons himself to sensual joys. Carlo and Ubaldo are sent to bring him back, and he escapes from Armida, but she follows him, and not being able to allure him back again, sets fire to her palace, rushes into the midst of the fight, and is slain.

Byron Don Juan l. 71.

When the young queen of Frederick William of Prussia rode about in military costume to incite the Prussians to arms against Napoleon, the latter wittily said, "She is Armida in her distraction setting fire to her own palace."

(Both Gluck and Rossini have taken the story of Armida as the subject of an opera.)

Armida's Girdle Armida had an enchanted girdle, which, "in price and beauty," surpassed all her other ornaments, even the cestus of Venus was less costly. It told her everything, "and when she would be loved, she wore the same"—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Armstrong (John), called "The Laird's Jock." He is the laird of Mangerton. This old warrior witnesses a national combat in the valley of Liddesdale, between his son (the Scotch chieftain) and Foster (the English champion), in which young Armstrong is overthrown.—Sir W. Scott, The Laird's Jock (time, Elizabeth).

Armstrong (Grace), the bride-elect of Hobbie Elliot of the heugh-foot, a young farmer.—Sir W. Scott, The Black Dwarf (time, Anno).

Arn'old, the deformed son of Bertha, who hates him for his ugliness. Weary of life, he is about to make away with himself, when a stranger accosts him, and promises to transform him into any shape he likes best. He chooses that of Achilles, and then goes to Rome, where he joins the besieging army of Bourbon. During the siege, Arnold enters St Peter's of Rome just in time to rescue Olympia, but the proud beauty, to prevent being taken captive by him, flings herself from the high altar on the pavement, and is taken up apparently lifeless. As the drama was never completed, the sequel is not known—Byron, The Deformed Transformed

Ar'nold of Benthuysen, disguised as a beggar, and called "Ginks"—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Beggar's Bush (1622)

Arnoldo, son of Melchiel, patriot of the forest cantons of Switzerland. He was in love with Mathilde (3 syl), sister of Gessler, the Austrian governor of the district. When the tyranny of Gessler drove the Swiss into rebellion, Arnoldo joined the insurgents, but after the death of Gessler he married Mathilde, whose life he had saved when it was imperilled by an avalanche—Rossini, Guglielmo Tell (1829)

Arnol'do, a gentleman contracted to Zeno'cia, a chaste lady, dishonourably pursued by the governor, count Clodio—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Custom of the Country (1647)

Ar'nolphe (2 syl), a man of wealth, who has a crotchety about the proper training of girls to make good wives, and tries his scheme on Agnès, whom he adopts from a peasant's hut, and whom he intends in time to make his wife. She is brought up, from the age of four years, in a country convent, where difference of sex and the conventions of society are wholly ignored, but when removed from the convent Agnès treats men like school-girls, nods to them familiarly, kisses them, and plays with them. Being told by her guardian that married women have more freedom than maidens, she asks him to marry her, however, a young man named Horace falls in love with her, and makes her his wife, so Arnolphe after all profits nothing by his pains—Molière, L'École des Femmes (1662)

Ar'rot (Dame), the weasel in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498)

Arrow Festival (The), instituted by Zoroaster to commemorate the flight of the arrow shot from the top of the Peak of Demavend, in Persia, with such miraculous prowess as to reach the bank of the Oxus, causing the whole intervening country to be ceded to Persia

and Little John "frequently shot an arrow a measured mile" (1760 yards)

Trilillon informs us that in one of Robin Hood's peregrinations attended by Little John he went to dine at Whitby Abbey with the abbot Richard. They went to the top of the abbey and each of them shot an arrow which fell not far from Whitby bath and a pillar was set up by the abbot where each arrow was found. Both fell more than a measured mile from the abbey—Chronicon Hist. orig. Whitby, York 116.

Ar'saces (3 syl), the patronymic name of the Persian kings, from Arsaces, their great monarch. It was generally added to some distinctive name or appellation, as the Roman emperors added the name of Cæsar to their own.

Arse'tes (3 syl), the aged eunuch who brought up Cloridan, and attended on her—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Ar'taban, the French type of nobility pride.

Ar'tamenes (3 syl) or Le Grand Cyrus, a "long-winded romance," by Mille Seuduri (1607-1791).

Artaxam'inous, king of Utopia, married to Griselmus whom he wishes to divorce for Distaffina. But Distaffina is betrothed to general Bombastis and when the general finds that his "fond one" prefers "half a crown" to himself, he hates all the world, and challenges the whole race of man by hanging his boots on a tree and daring any one to displace them. The king, coming to the spot, reads the challenge, and cuts the boots down, whereupon Bombastis falls on his majesty, and "kills him," in a theatrical sense, for the dead monarch, at the close of the ballet, joins in the dance, and promises, if the audience like, "to die again tomorrow"—W. B. Rhodes, Bombastis Furioso.

Ar'tchula Mur'tchula, the magic words which "Forteen" was required to pronounce when he wished to get any specific object "into his sack"—A Basque Legend (See FORTTEEN).

Ar'tegal or Arthegal (5r), son of Gorlois prince of Cornwall, stolen in infancy by the faeries, and brought up in Fairyland. Britomart saw him in Venus's looking-glass, and fell in love with him. She married him, and became the mother of Aurelius Conan, from whom (through Cadwallader) the Tudor dynasty derives descent. The wanderings of Britomart, as a lady knight-errant and the impersonation of chastity, is the subject of

bk. iii of the Fairy Queen, and the achievements of sir Artegal, as the impersonation of justice, is the subject of bk. v.

Sir Artegal's first exploit was to decide to which claimant a living woman belonged. Thus he decided according to Solomon's famous judgment respecting "the living and dead child" (canto 1). His next was to destroy the corrupt practice of bribery and toll (canto 2). His third was the exposing of Braggi-docco and his follower Trompart (canto 3). He had then to decide to which brother a chest of money found at sea belonged, whether to Breidas or Am'idias, he gave judgment in favour of the former (canto 4). He then fell into the hands of Radigund queen of the Amazons, and was released by Britomart (cantos 5 and 6), who killed Radigund (canto 7). His last and greatest achievement was the deliverance of Ire'na (Island) from Grantorto (Iskellon), whom he slew (canto 12).

N.B.—This rebellion was that called the earl of Desmond's, in 1580. Before bk. iv. 6, Artegal is spelt Arthegal, but never afterwards.

* * "Sir Artegal" is meant for lord Gray of Wilton, Spenser's friend. He was sent in 1580 into Ireland as lord-lieutenant, and the poet was his secretary. The marriage of Artegal with Britomart means that the justice of lord Gray was united to purity of mind or perfect integrity of conduct—Spenser, Fairy Queen, v. (1596).

Arturo (lord Arthur Talbot), a cavalieralliance to Flv'ra "the puritan," daughter of lord Walton On the day appointed for the wedding, Arturo has to aid Enrichetta (Henrietta, widow of Charles I) in her escape, and Elvira, supposing he is eloping with a rival, temporarily loses her reason On his return, Arturo explains the circumstances, and they vow never more to part At this juncture Arturo is arrested for treason, and led away to execution, but a herald announces the defeat of the Stuarts, and free pardon of all political offenders, whereupon Arturo is released, and marries "the fair puritan"—Bellini's opera, I Puritani (1834)

Ar'valan, the wicked son of Keha'ma, slain by Ladur'lad for attempting to dishonour his daughter Kail'yal (2 syl) After this, his spirit became the relentless persecutor of the holy maiden, but holiness and elasticity triumphed over sin and lust Thus when Kail'yal was taken to the bower of bliss in paradise, Arvalan borrowed the dragon-car of the witch Lor'rumite (3 syl) to carry her off, but when the dragons came in sight of the holy place they were unable to mount, and went perpetually downwards, till Arvalan was dropped into an ice-rift of perpetual snow When he presented himself before her in the temple of Jagannaut, she set fire to the pagoda And when he caught the maiden waiting for her father, who was gone to release the glendoveer from the submerged city of Baly, Baly himself came to her rescue

' Help help Kehama! help! he cried.
But Baly tarried not to abide
That mightier power With irresistible feet
He stamp'd and cleft the earth ' It opened wide
And gave him way to his own judgment seat.
Down like a plummet to the world below
He sank to punishment deserved and endless woe
Southey Curse of Kehama xvii. 12 (1809)

Arvi'da (Prince), a noble friend of Gustavus Vasa Both Arvida and Gns-tavus are in love with Christi'na, daughter of Christian II king of Scandinavia Christian employs the prince to entrap Gustavus, but when he approaches him the better instincts of old friendship and the nobleness of Gustavus prevail, so that Arvida not only refuses to betray his friend, but even vouches to him all further rivalry in the love of Christina — H Brooke, Gustavus Vasa (1730)

Arvir'agus, the husband of Dorigen Aurelius tried to win her love, but Dorigen made answer that she would never listen to his suit till the rocks that beset the coast were removed, "and there n'is no stone y-seen" By the aid of magic, Aurelius caused all the rocks of the coast to disappear, and Dorigen's husband insisted that she should keep her word When Aurelius saw how sad she was, and was told that she had come in obedience to her husband's wishes, he said he would rather die than injure so true a wife and noble a gentleman —Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Franklin's Tale," 1388)

Arvir'agus, younger son of Cym'beline (3 syl) king of Britain, and brother of Guide'rius The two in early childhood were kidnapped by Belarius, out of revenge for being unjustly banished, and were brought up by him in a cave When they were grown to manhood, Belarius, having rescued the king from the Romans, was restored to favour He then introduced the two young men to Cymbeline, and told their story, upon which the king was rejoiced to find that his two sons whom he thought dead were both living — Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605)

As You Like It, comedy by Shakespeare One of the French dukes, being driven from his dukedom by his brother, went with certain followers to the forest of Arden, where they lived a free and easy life, chiefly occupied in the chase The deposed duke had one daughter, named Rosalind, whom the usurper kept at court as the companion of his own daughter Celia, and the two cousins were very fond of each other At a wrestling match Rosalind fell in love with Orlando, who threw his antagonist, a giant and professional athlete The usurping duke (Frederick) now banished her from the court, but her cousin Celia resolved to go to Arden with her, so Rosalind in boy's clothes (under the name of Ganymed), and Celia as a rustic maiden (under the name of Aliena), started to find the deposed duke Orlando being driven from home by his elder brother, also went to the forest of Arden, and was taken under the duke's protection Here he met the ladies, and a double marriage was the result—Orlando married Rosalind, and his elder brother Oliver married Celia
 The usurper retired to a religious house, and the deposed duke was restored to his dominions —(1598)

Lucy Ash'ton, daughter of sir William, betrothed to Lagar (the master of Ravenswood) but being compelled to marry Frank Huxton (lord of Buel law) betrays to murder him in the bridal chamber, and becomes insane. Lucy dies, but the lord recovers—Sir W. Scott, The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.)

(This has been made the subject of an opera by Donizetti, called Lucy Ash'ton in Lammermoor, 1835.)

Asia, the wife of that Pharaoh who brought up Moses. She was the daughter of Mozaheim—Sale, Koran, xx note.

Asia, wife of that Pharaoh who knew not Joseph. Her husband tortured her for believing in Moses, but she was taken alive into paradise—Sale, Al Koran, lxxi note.

Mohomet says "Among women four have been perfect. Asia, wife of Pharaoh, Mary, daughter of Imran, Khadijah, the prophet's first wife, and Fatima, his own daughter."

As'ir, the twelve chief gods of Scandinavian mythology—Odin, Thor, Baldr, Njord, Frey, Tyr, Bragi, Heimdall, Vidar, Vali, Ullur, and Forseti.

Sometimes the goddesses—Frigga, Freyja, Idunna, and Sagna, are ranked amongst the Asir also.

As'madai (3 syl), the same as Asmodeus (1 syl), the lustful and destroying angel, who robbed Sara of her seven husbands (Tobit iii 8). Milton makes him one of the rebellious angels overthrown by Uriel and Raphael. Humie says the word means "the de troquer"—Paradise Lost, vi 365 (1667).

Asmodeus (1 syl), the demon of vanity and dress, called in the Talmud "king of the devils." As "dress" is one of the bitterest evils of modern life, it is termed "the Asmodeus of domestic peace," a phrase employed to express any "skeleton" in the house of a private family.

In the book of Tobit Asmodeus falls in love with Sara, daughter of Raguel, and causes the successive deaths of seven husbands each on his bridal night, but when Sara married Tobit, Asmodeus was driven into Egypt by a charm made of the heart and liver of a fish burnt on perfumed reeds.

Asmodeus, a "diable bon-homme," with more guile than malice, not the least like Mephistopheles. He is the companion of Cl'ofis, whom he carries through the air, and shows him the inside of houses, where they see what is being done in private or secrecy without being seen. Although Asmodeus is not malignant, yet with all his wit, gentleness, and playful malice, we never forget the fiend even when he is most engaging.

(Such was the popularity of the Diable Boiteux, that two young men fought a duel in a bookseller's shop over the only remaining copy, an incident worthy to be recorded by Asmodeus himself.)

Mrs. Austen gives us such a picture of domes life as Asmodeus would present could he remove the roof of many an English home—Jane Eyre, Art. I. 101 (1818).

Asotus, Prodigality personified in The Purple Island (1643), by Phineas Fletcher, fully described in canto viii (Greek, avotos, "a prodigate").

Aspa'tia, a maiden the very ideal of ill-fortune and wretchedness. She is the troth-plight wife of Anuntor, but Amintor, at the king's request, marries Evad'no (3 syl.) Women point with scorn at the forsaken Aspatia, but she hears it all with patience. The pathos of her speeches is most touching, and her death forms the tragical event which gives name to the drama.—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Maid's Tragedy (1610)

Asphaltic Pool (The), the Dead Sea, so called from the asphalt or bitumen abounding in it. The river Jordan empties itself into this "pool"—Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 411 (1666)

Asphodel, in the language of flowers, means "regret." It is said that the spirits of the dead sustain themselves with the roots of this flower. It was planted by the ancients on graves, and both Theophrastus and Pliny state that the ghosts beyond Acheron roam through the meadows of Asphodel, in order if possible to reach the waters of Lethe or Oblivion. The Asphodel was dedicated to Pluto. Longfellow strangely enough crowns his angel of death with amaranth, with which the "spirits elect bind their resplendent locks," and his angel of life with asphodel, the flower of "regret" and emblem of the grave.

He who wore the crown of asphodels
[said] My errand is not death, but life
[laid] The angel with the anamathino wreath
Whispered a word that had a sound like death.

Brenhilda of Aspramonte, their daughter, wife of Count Robert.

As'rael or Az'rael, an angel of death. He is immeasurable in height, inasmuch that the space between his eyes equals a 70,000 days' journey.—Mohammedan Mythology.

Ass (An), emblem of the tribe of Issachar. In the old church at Totnes is a stone pulpit, divided into compartments, the shields decorated with the several emblems of the Jewish tribes, of which this is one.

Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two burdens.—Gen. xlix. 14.

Ass. Three of these animals are by different legends admitted into heaven.
1 The ass on which Christ rode on His journey to Jerusalem on the day of palms.
2 The ass on which Balaam rode, and which reproved the prophet, "speaking with the voice of a man."
3 The ass of Arz's queen of Sheba or Saba, who came to visit Solomon. (See ANIMALS, p. 40.)

Ass's Ears. Midas was chosen to decide a trial of musical skill between Apollo and Pan. The Phrygian king gave his verdict in favour of Pan, whereupon Apollo changed his ears to those of an ass. The servant who used to cut the king's hair, discovering the deformity, was afraid to whisper the secret to any one, but not being able to contain himself, dug a hole in the earth, and, putting his mouth into it, cried out, "King Midas has ass's ears." He then filled up the hole, and felt relieved. Tennyson makes the barber a woman.

The Princess ii.

As'sad, son of Camaralzaman and Hamatal'nefous (5 syl.), and half-brother of Amgiad (son of Camaralzaman and Badour). Each of the two mothers conceived a base passion for the other's son, and when the young men repulsed their advances, accused them to their father of gross designs upon their honour. Camaralzaman commanded his vizier to put them both to death, but instead of doing so, he conducted them out of the city, and told them not to return to their father's kingdom (the island of Ebony). They wandered on for ten days, when Assad went to a city in sight to obtain provisions. Here he was entrapped by an old fire-worshipper, who offered him hospitality, but cast him into a dungeon, intending to offer him up a human victim on the "mountain of fire." The ship in which he was sent being driven on the coast of queen Margiana, Assad was sold to her as a slave, but being recaptured was carried back to his old dungeon. Here Bostana, one of the old man's daughters, took pity on him, and released him, and ere long Assad married queen Margiana, while Amgiad, out of gratitude, married Bostana.—Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and Assad").

As'sidos, a plant in the country of amusement. Pastoral romance had reappeared in Portugal full sixty years previously in the pastoral romance of Montemayer called Diana (1552), and Longo, in the fifth century, had produced a beautiful prose pastoral called The Loves of Daphnis and Chloe, but both these pastorals stand alone, while that of D'Urfé is the beginning of a long series.

Astringer, a falconer. Shakespeare introduces an astringer in All's Well that Ends Well, act v. sc. 1. (From the French austour, Latin austereus, "a goshawk.") A "gentle astringer" is a gentleman falconer.

We usually call a falconer who keeps that kind of hawk [the goshawk] an astringer.—Cowell, Law Dictionary.

As'tro-flamman'te (5 syl), queen of the night. The word means "flaming star"—Mozart, Die Zauberflote (1791).

Astionomer (The), in Rasselas, an old enthusiast, who believed himself to have the control and direction of the weather. He leaves Imlac his successor, but implores him not to interfere with the constituted order.

I have possessed said he to Imlac for five years the regulation of the weather and the distribution of the seasons. The sun has listened to my dicta and I have ordered from tropic to tropic by my direction the clouds at my call have poured their waters and the Nile has overflowed at my command. I have re-trained the rage of the De-star and mitigated the fury of the Crab. The winds alone have hitherto refused my authority. I am the first of human beings to whom this trust has been imparted.—Dr. Johnson Pastorals XL—XLII (159).

As'trophel, Sir Philip Sidney. Phil Sid may be a contraction of philos idus, and the Latin silus being changed to the Greek astion, we get astion philos ("star-lover"). The "star" he loved was Penelope Devereux, whom he calls Stella ("star"), and to whom he was betrothed. Spenser wrote a poem called Astrophel, to the memory of Sir Philip Sidney.

Astyn'ome (4 syl) or Chryseis, daughter of Chryseis priest of Apollo. When Lyrnessus was taken, Astynomé fell to the share of Agamemnon but the father begged to be allowed to ransom her. Agamemnon refused to comply, whereupon the priest invoked the anger of his patron god, and Apollo sent a plague into the Grecian camp. This was the cause of contention between Agamemnon and Achilles, and forms the subject of Homer's epic called The Iliad.

As'wad, son of Shedad king of Ad. He was saved alive when the angel of death destroyed Shedad and all his subjects because he showed mercy to a camel which had been bound to a tomb to starve to death that it might serve its master on the day of resurrection—Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer (1797).

Asy'lum Chris'ti. So England was called by the Cambrards during the scandalous religious persecutions of the "Grand Monarque" (Louis XIV).

Atabalipa, the last emperor of Peru, subdued by Pizarro, the Spanish general. Milton refers to him in Paradise Lost, xi. 409 (1665).

At'ala, the name of a novel by Francois Rene Chateaubriand. It was published in 1801, and created universal admiration. Like his novel called René, it was designed as an episode to his Genie du Christianisme. His wanderings through the primeval woods of North America are described in Atala and René also.

(This has nothing to do with Attila, king of the Huns, nor with Athalie (queen of Judah), the subject of Racine's great tragedy.)

Atalanta, of Arcadia, wished to remain single, and therefore gave out that she would marry no one who could not outstrip her in running, but if any challenged her and lost the race, he was to lose his life. Hippomenes won the race by throwing down golden apples, which Atalanta kept stopping to pick up. William Morris has chosen this for one of his tales in Earthly Paradise (March).

In short, he thus appeared like another Atalanta.—Comtesse D'Aunoy Fairy Tales (Fortunio) 162.

Atal'ba, the inca of Peru, most dearly beloved by his subjects, on whom Pizarro makes war. An old man says of the inca—

The virtues of our monarch alike secure to him the affection of his people and the benign regard of Heaven.—Sheridan Pizarro li. 4 (from Fetzlue) (1799).

Atba'ra or Blar' River called the "dark mother of Egypt" (See BLACK RIVER).

Ate (2 syl), goddess of revenge.

With him along is come the mother queen
An Ate stirring him to blood and strife.
Shakespeare King John act ii. sc. 1 (1566).

Ate (2 syl), "mother of debate and all dissension," the friend of Duessa. She squirmed, lied with a false tongue, and maligned even the best of beings.

Her abode, "far under ground hard by the gates of hell" is described at length in bk. iv. 1. When sir Blandamour was challenged by Braggadocchio (canto 1), the terms of the contest were that the conqueror should have "Florinel," and the other "the old hag Att," who was always to ride beside him till he could pass her off to another—Spenser, Joyry Orn, iv. (1596)

Atellan Fables (The), in Latin Atellan Fabula, a species of farce performed by the ancient Romans, and so called from Atella in Campania. They differed from comedy because no magistrates or persons of rank were introduced, they differed from the Terrenaria or comœ drama, because domestic life was not represented in them, and they differed from the mutus, because there was neither buffoonery nor ribaldry. They were not performed by professional actors, but by Roman citizens of rank, were written in the Oscan language, and were distinguished for their refined humor.

They were supposed to be directly derived from the Atellan Fabula—See W. Scott, The Atellan Fabula.

Athra, a country in Connaught, which for a time had its own chief, and sometimes usurped the throne of Ireland. Thus Cairbar (lord of Athra) usurped the throne, but was displaced by Fingal who restored Corar king of Ulster. The war of Fingal with Cairbar is the subject of the Ossianic poem Tenora, so called from the palace of that name where Cairbar murdered king Corar. The kings of the Irish were called "lords of Athra"—Ossian.

Athalie (3 syl), daughter of Ahab and Jezebel and wife of Joram king of Judah. She massacred all the remnant of the house of David, but herself escaped, and six years afterwards was proclaimed king. Athalie, attracted by the shouts, went to the temple, and was killed by the mob. This forms the subject and title of Racine's chef-d'œuvre (1691), and was Mlle Rachel's great part.

Atheist's Tragedy (The), by Cyril Tourneur. The "atheist" is D'Amville, who murders his brother Montferrers for his estates—(Seventeenth century.)

Athelstane (3 syl), surnamed "The Unready," thane of Coningsburgh—Sir W. Scott, John Bar (time, Richard I.)

* * "Unready" does not mean unprepared but injudicious (from Anglo-Saxon, rad, "wisdom, counsel")

Athe'na (Juno) once meant "the air," but in Homer this goddess is the representative of civic prudence and military skill, the armed protectress of states and cities.

Athe'man Bee, Plato, so called from the honeyed sweetness of his composition. It is said that a bee settled on his lip while he was an infant asleep in his cradle, and indicated that "honeyed words" would fall from his lips, and flow from his pen. Sophocles is called "The Attic Bee."

Athenodo'rus, the Stoic, told Augustus the best way to restrain unruly anger was to repeat the alphabet before giving way to it.

The secret line led him at once to repeat
And led the storm and cooled the raging heat.
Tidell The Horn book

Athens of Switzerland, Zurich, so called from the number of protestant refugees who resorted thither, and inundated Europe with their works on controversial divinity. Coverdale's Bible was printed at Zurich in 1535, here Zuinglius preached, and here Lavater lived.

Athens of the West, Cordova, in Spain, was so called in the middle ages.

Athun'ree, in Connaught, where was fought the great battle between Felim O'Connor on the side of the Irish, and William de Bourgo on the side of the English. The Irish lost 10,000 men, and the whole tribe of the O'Connors fell except Felim's brother, who escaped alive.

Atim'us, Baseness of Mind personified in The Purple Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher. "A careless, idle swain his work to eat, drink, sleep, and purge his reins." Fully described in canto viii (Greek, atimos, "one dishonoured").

The weight of mightiest monarchies.
Milton Paradise Lost ii 305 (1667)

Atlan'tis Lord Breon wrote an allegorical fiction called Atlantis or The New Atlantis. It is an island in the Atlantic, on which the author feigns that he was wrecked, and there he found every model arrangement for the promotion of science and the perfection of man as a social being.

A moral country—but I hold his hand
For I did daunt to write an Atlantis.

Byron Don Juan xl 47

Atlas' Shoulders, enormous strength. Atlas king of Mauritania is said to support the world on his shoulders.

Atossa. So Pope calls Sarah duchess of Marlborough, because she was the great friend of lady Mary Wortley Montagu, whom he calls Sappho.

But what are these to great Atossa's mind?

Pope.

At'ropos, one of the Fates whose office is to cut the thread of life with a pair of scissors.

nor shines the knife

Byron Don Juan ii 64.

Attie Bee (The), Sophocles (n c 495-405). Plato is called "The Athenian Bee."

Attie Boy (The), referred to by Milton in his Il Penseroso, is Cephalos, who was beloved by Aurora or Morn, but was married to Procris. He was passionately fond of hunting.

Till civil suited Morn appear
Not tricked and flounced, as she was wont
With the Attie boy to hunt,
But kerchiefed in a comely cloud.

Il Penseroso (1638)

Attie Muse (The), Xenophon the historian (n c 444-359).

Atticus (The English), Joseph Addison (1672-1719).

Who but must laugh if such a man there be
Who would not weep if Atticus were he?
Pope Prologue to the Satires

The Christian Atticus, Reginald Heber, bishop of Calcutta (1783-1826).

The Irish Atticus, George Faulkner, printer and author (1700-1770).

At'tila, one of the tragedies of Pierre Corneille (1667). This king of the Huns, usually called "The Scourge of God," must not be confounded with "Athalie," daughter of Jezebel and wife of Joram, the subject and title of Racine's chef-d'œuvre, and Mdlle Rachel's chief character.

Aubert (Thérèse), the chief character of a romance by C. Nodier (1819). The story contains the adventures of a young royalist in the French Revolution, who disguised himself in female attire to escape discovery.

Aubrey, a widower for eighteen years. At the death of his wife he committed his infant daughter to the care of Mr. Bridgemore, a merchant, and lived abroad. He returned to London after an absence of eighteen years and found that Bridgemore had abused his trust, and his daughter had been obliged to quit the house and seek protection with Mr Mortimer

Augusta Aubrey, daughter of Mr Aubrey, in love with Francis Tyrrel, the nephew of Mr Mortimer. She is snubbed and persecuted by the vulgar Lucinda Bridgemore, and most wantonly persecuted by Lord Abberville, but after passing through many a most painful visitation, she is happily married to the man of her choice—Cumberland, The Fashionable Lover (1780)

Au'bri's Dog showed a most unaccountable hatred to Richard de Macaire, snarling and flying at him whenever he appeared in sight. Now Aubri had been murdered by some one in the forest of Bondy, and this animosity of the dog directed suspicion towards Richard de Macaire. Richard was taken up, and condemned to single combat with the dog, by whom he was killed. In his dying moments he confessed himself to be the murderer of Aubri. (See Dog)

Le combat entre Macaire et le chien eut lieu à Paris dans l'île Lacroix. On place ce fait merveilleux en 1371 ans. Il est bien antérieur car il est mentionné dès le siècle précédent par Aubrie des Trois-Franchises.—Bouille.—Dict. L'histoire &c

Audhum'bla, the cow created by Surt to nourish Ymir. She supplied him with four rivers of milk, and was herself nourished by licking dew from the rocks—Scandinavian Mythology

Audley Is John Audley here? In Richardson's travelling theatrical booth this question was asked aloud, to signify that the performance was to be brought to a close as soon as possible, as the platform was crowded with new-comers, waiting to be admitted (1766-1836)

The same question was asked by Shuter (in 1759), whose travelling company preceded Richardson's

Au'drey, a country wench, who jilted William for Touchstone. She is an excellent specimen of a wondering shew-gawky. She thanks the gods that "she is foul," and if to be poetical is not to be honest, she thanks the gods also that "she is not poetical"—Shakespeare, As You Like It (1598)

The character of "Audrey" that of a female fool should not have been assumed (i.e. by Miss Love) in her last appearance in public, the last time of the farewell address was. And now poor Audrey bids you all farewell (May 26 1848)—James Smith Memoirs &c. (1849)

the I'prians, in this, kept 2000 oxen for thirty years in stalls which were never cleansed. It was one of the twelve labours of Her'culés to cleanse these stables in one day. Thus he accomplished by letting two rivers into them.

If the Augean stable (of dramatic impurity) was not sufficiently clean of the stream of public opinion was fairly directed against its conglomerated impurities.—Sir W. Scott, The Drama

Augusta London [Trinobantina] was so called by the Romans

Where full in view Ausu'ta's spires are seen
With flowery lawns and waving woods between
A humble habitation rose beside
Where Thames meandering rolls his ample tide
Falconer The Shipwreck L. 3 (1766)

Augusta, mother of Gustavus Vasa. She is a prisoner of Christian II king of Denmark, but the king promises to set her free if she will induce her son to submission. Augusta refuses, but in the war which follows, Gustavus defeats Christian, and becomes king of Sweden—H. Brooke, Gustavus Vasa (1730)

Augusta, a title conferred by the Roman emperors on their wives, sisters, daughters, mothers, and even concubines. It had to be conferred, for even the wife of an Augustus was not an Augusta until after her coronation.

1 IMPERIALIS. Livia and Julia were both Augusta, so were Julia (wife of Tiberius), Messalina, Agrippina, Octavia, Poppa, Statilia, Sabina, Domitilla, Domitia, and Faustina. In imperial times the wife of an emperor is spoken of as Augusta. Serenissima Augusta conjux nostra, Digna Augusta, &c. But the title had to be conferred, hence we read, "Domitian uxorem suam Augustam jussit nuncupari," and "Flavia Titiana, eadem die, uxor ejus [i.e. Pertinax] Augusta est appellata."

2 MOTHERS OF GRANDMOTHERS. Antonia, grandmother of Caligula, was created Augusta. Claudius made his mother Antonia Augusta after her death. Heliodorus had coins inscribed with "Julia Mater Augusta," in honour of his grandmother, Mamma, mother of Alexander Severus, is styled Augusta on coins, and so is Helena, mother of Constantine.

3 SISTERS. Honorius speaks of his sister as "venerabilis Augusta germana nostra." Trajan has coins inscribed with "Diva Marciana Augusta."

4 DAUGHTERS. Mithra Scantilla the wife, and Didia the daughter of Didius Julianus, were both Augusta. Titus inscribed on coins his daughter as "Julia"

Sabina Augusta," there are coins of the emperor Decius inscribed with "Herennia Etruscilla Augusta," and "Sallustia Augusta," sisters of the emperor Decius

5 Otho's Matidia, niece of Trajan, is called Augusta on coins. Constantine Monomachus called his concubine Augusta

Augustan Age, the golden age of a people's literature, so called because while Augustus was emperor, Rome was noted for its literary giants

The Augustan Age of England, the Elizabethan period. That of Anne is called the "Silver Age"

The Augustan Age of France, that of Louis XIV (1610-1710)

The Augustan Age of Germany, nineteenth century

The Augustan Age of Portugal, from John the Great to John III (1455-1557)

In this period Brazil was occupied, the African coast explored, the sea-route to India was traversed, and Camoens flourished

Augustina, the Maid of Saragosa. She was only 22 when, her lover being shot, she mounted the battery in his place. The French, after a siege of two months, were obliged to retreat, August 15, 1808

Such were the exploits of the Maid of Saragosa who by her valor elevated herself to the highest rank of heroism. When the author was at Seville she walked daily on the Prado decorated with medals and orders by order of the Junta.—Lord Byron

Austria and the Lion's Hide. There is an old tale that the arch-duke of Austria killed Richard I, and wore as a spoil the lion's hide which belonged to our English monarch. Hence Tanken-bridge (the natural son of Richard) swears jeeringly to the arch-duke

Then wear a lion's hide I doff it for shame,
And hang a calf skin on these recreant limbs.
Shakespeare King John act III sc 1 (1486)

(The point is better understood when it is borne in mind that fools and jesters were dressed in calf-skins)

Austrian Lip (The), a protruding under jaw, with a heavy lip disinclined to shut close. It came from Kaiser Maximilian I, son of Kaiser Frederick III, and was inherited from his grandmother Cimburbis, a Polish princess, dike of Masovia's daughter, and hence called the "Cimburbis Under Lip."

Autol'ycos, the craftiest of thieves. He stole the flocks of his neighbours, and changed their marks. Sis'phos outwitted him by marking his sheep under their feet.

Autol'ycus, a pedlar and witty rogue, in The Winter's Tale, by Shakespeare (1604)

Av'alon or Avallon, Glastonbury, generally called the "isle of Avalon." The abode of King Arthur, Obéron, Morgane la Fee, the Fees generally, and sometimes called the "island of the blest." It is very fully described in the French romance of Ogyer le Danois. Tennyson calls it Avilion (q.v.). Dryden, in his Polyolbon, styles it "the ancient isle of Avilion," and the Romans "insula Avalonia."

O three times famous Isle! where is that place that might Be with thy: If compared for glory and delight, Whil' Glastonbury's good?

Avare (L') The plot of this comedy is as follows: Harpagon the miser and his son Cleante (2 syl.) both want to marry Mariane (3 syl.), daughter of Anselme, alias don Thomas d'Alburei, of Naples. Cleante gets possession of a casket of gold belonging to the miser, and hidden in the garden. When Harpagon discovers his loss he raves like a mad man, and Cleante gives him the choice of Mariane or the casket. The miser chooses the casket, and leaves the young lady to his son. The second plot is connected with Elise (2 syl.), the miser's daughter, promised in marriage by the father to his friend Anselme (2 syl.), but Elise is herself in love with Valere, who, however, turns out to be the son of Anselme. As soon as Anselme discovers that Valere is his son, who he thought had been lost at sea, he resigns to him Elise, and so in both instances the young folks marry together, and the old ones give up their unnatural rivalry. — Molière, L'Avare (1667)

Ava'tar, the descent of Brahma to this earth. It is said in Hindu mythology that Brahma has already descended nine times in various forms, but is yet to appear a tenth, in the figure of a warrior upon a white horse, to cut off all incorrigible offenders.

Baba (Ali), who relates the story of the "Forty Thieves" in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. He discovered the thieves' cave while hiding in a tree, and heard the magic word "Ses'amé," at which the door of the cave opened and shut.

Cassim Baba, brother of Ali Baba, who entered the cave of the forty thieves, but forgot the pass-word, and stood crying "Open Wheat!" "Open Barley!" to the door, which obeyed no sound but "Open Sesamé!"

Baba Mus'tapha, a cobbler who sewed together the four pieces into which Cassim's body had been cleft by the forty thieves. When the thieves discovered that the body had been taken away, they sent one of the band into the city, to ascertain who had died of late. The man happened to enter the cobbler's stall, and falling into a gossip heard about the body which the cobbler had sewed together. Mus'tapha pointed out to him the house of Cassim Baba's widow, and the thief marked it with a piece of white chalk. Next day the cobbler pointed out the house to another, who marked it with red chalk. And the day following he pointed it out to the captain of the band, who instead of marking the door studied the house till he felt sure of recognizing it.—Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba or The Forty Thieves")

He is also given to over-acting, and to abusing his poor native servant—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846).

Bah'adai, master of the horse to the king of the Magi. Prince Am'grad was enticed by a collet to enter the minister's house, and when Bah'adar returned, he was not a little surprised at the sight of his unwitted guest. The prince, however, explained to him in private how the matter stood, and Bah'adar, entering into the fun of the thing, assumed for the nonce the place of a slave. The collet would have murdered him, but Am'grad, to save the minister, cut off her head. Bah'adar, being arrested for murder, was condemned to death, but Am'grad came forward and told the whole truth, whereupon Bah'adar was instantly released, and Am'grad created vizier—Arabian Nights ("Am'grad and Assad").

Bailiff's Daughter of Islington (in Norfolk). A squire's son loved the bailiff's daughter, but she gave him no encouragement, and his friends sent him to London "an apprentice for to bind." After the lapse of seven years, the bailiff's daughter, "in ragged attire," set out to walk to London, "her true love to inquire." The young man on horseback met her, but knew her not. "One penny, one penny, kind sir!" she said. "Where were you born?" asked the young man. "At Islington," she replied. "Then prithee, sweetheart, do you know the bailiff's daughter there?" "She's dead, sir, long ago." On hearing this the young man declared he'd live an exile in some foreign land. "Stay, oh stay, thou goodly youth," the maiden cried, "she is not really dead, for I am she." "Then farewell grief and welcome joy, for I have found my true love, whom I feared I should never see again"—Perev, Relics of English Poetry, ii 8.

Baj'azet, surnamed "The Thunderbolt" (ilderim), sultan of Turkey. After subjugating Bulgaria, Macedonia, Thessaly, and Asia Minor, he laid siege to Constantinople, but was taken captive by Tamerlane emperor of Tartary. He was fierce as a wolf, reckless, and indomitable. Being asked by Tamerlane how he would have treated him had their lots been reversed, "Like a dog," he cried. "I would have made you my footstool when I mounted my saddle, and when your services were not needed would have chained you in a cage like a wild beast." Tamerlane replied, "Then to show you the difference of my spirit, I shall treat you as a king." So saying, he ordered his chains to be struck off, gave him one of the royal tents, and promised to restore him to his throne if he would lay aside his hostility. Bajazet abused this noble generosity, plotted the assassination of Tamerlane, and bowstrung Moncses. Finding clemency of no use, Tamerlane commanded him to be used "as a dog, and to be chained in a cage like a wild beast"—N Rowe, Tamerlane (a tragedy, 1702)

* * This was one of the favourite parts of Spranger Barry (1719-1777) and J Kemble (1757-1823)

Bajura, Mahomet's standard

Baker (The), and the "Baker's Wife" Iouis XVI and Marie Antoinette were so called by the revolutionary party, because on the 6th October, 1789, they ordered a supply of bread to be given to the mob which surrounded the palace at Versailles, clamouring for bread

Ba'taam (2 syl), the earl of Huntingdon, one of the rebels in the army of the duke of Monmouth

And therefore in the name of dulness be
The well hung Balaam.
Dryden Absalom and Achitophel

Ba'taam, a "citizen of sober fame," who lived near the monument of London. While poor he was "religious, punctual, and frugal," but when he became rich and got knighted, he seldom went to church, became a courtier, "took a bribe from France," and was hung for treason—Pope, Moral Essays, III

Balaam and Josaphat, a religious novel by Johannes Damascenus, son of Almansur (For plot, see JOSAPHAT)

Balack, Dr Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, who wrote a history called Burnet's Own Time, and History of the Reformation—Dryden and Tate, Absalom and Achitophel, II

Balafre (Le), alias Ludovic Lesly, an old archer of the Scottish Guard at Plessis les Tours, one of the castle palaces of Louis XI. Le Balafre is uncle to Quentin Durward—Sir W Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV)

* * Henri, son of François second duke of Guise, was called Le Balafre ("the gashed"), from a frightful scar in the face from a sword-cut in the battle of Dormans (1575)

Balám', the ox on which the faithful feed in paradise. The fish is called Nûn, the lobes of whose liver will suffice for 70,000 men

Balan', brother of Balyn or Balin le Savage, two of the most valiant knights that the world ever produced—Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, I 31 (1470)

Balan, "the bravest and strongest of all the giant race." Amadis de Gaul rescued Gabricletta from his hands—Vaseo de Looern, Amadis of Gaul, II 129 (fourteenth century)

Balance (Justice), father of Sylvia. He had once been in the army, and as he had run the gauntlet himself, he could make excuses for the wild pranks of young men.—G Farquhar, The Recruiting Office (1704)

Baland of Spain, a man of gigantic strength, who called himself "Fierabras"—Medieval Romance

Balchris'tie (Jenny), housekeeper to the laird of Dumbiedikes—Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Balclutha, a town belonging to the Britons on the river Clyde. It fell into the hands of Comhal (Fingal's father), and was burnt to the ground

"I have seen the walls of Balclutha," said Fingal, "but they were desolate. The fire had resounded in the halls and the voice of the people is heard no more. The thistle shook there its lonely head, the moss whistled in the wind, and the fox looked out from the windows."—Osian's Carver

Baldassa're (4 syl), chief of the monastery of St Jacopo di Compostella—Donizetti's opera, La Favorita (1842)

Bal'der, the god of light, peace, and day, was the young and beautiful son of Odin and Frigga. His palace, Brednablik ("wide-shining"), stood in the Milky Way. He was slain by Höder, the blind old god of darkness and night, but was restored to life at the general request of the gods—Scandinavian Mythology

Balder the beautiful
God of the summer sun
Longfellow Tegula's Death

(Sydney Dobell has a poem entitled Balder, published in 1854)

Bal'derston (Caleb), the favourite old butler of the master of Ravenswood, at Wolf's Crag Tower. Being told to provide supper for the laird of Bucklaw, he pretended that there were fat capon and good store in plenty, but all he could produce was "the hinder end of a mutton ham that had been three times on the table already, and the heel of a ewe-milk kebbuck [cheese]" (ch vii)—Sir W Scott, Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III)

Baldrick, an ancestor of the lady Evelyn Berenger "the betrothed." He was murdered, and lady Evelyn assured Rose Flammoek that she had seen his ghost frowning at her—Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Bal'dringham (The lady Lrmen-garde of), great-aunt of lady Evelyn Berenger "the betrothed"—Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Baldwin, the youngest and comeliest of Charlemagne's paladins, nephew of sir Roland

Baldwin, the restless and ambitious duke of Bolognia, leader of 1200 horse in the allied Christian army. He was Godfrey's brother, and very like him, but not so tall—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

* * He is introduced by sir Walter Scott in Count Robert of Paris

Baldwin. So the Ass is called in the beast-epic entitled Reynard the Fox (the word means "bold friend"). In pt iii he is called "Dr" Baldwin (1498)

Baldwin, tutor of Rollo ("the bloody brother") and Otto, dukes of Normandy, and sons of Sophia. Baldwin was put to death by Rollo, because Hamond slew Gisbert the chancellor with an axe and not with a sword. Rollo said that Baldwin deserved death "for teaching Hamond no better"—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Bloody Brother (1639)

Baldwin (Count), a fatal example of paternal self-will. He doted on his elder son Biron, but because he married against his inclination, disinherited him, and fixed all his love on Carlos his youngson. Biron fell at the siege of Candy, and was supposed to be dead. His wife Isabella mourned for him seven years, and being, on the point of starvation, applied to the count for aid, but he drove her from his house as a dog. Villeroy (2 syl) married her, but Biron returned the following day. Carlos, hearing of his brother's return, employed ruffians to murder him, and then charged Villeroy with the crime, but one of the ruffians impeached, Carlos was arrested, and Isabella, going mad, killed herself. Thus was the wilfulness of Baldwin the source of infinite misery. It caused the death of his two sons, as well as of his daughter-in-law—Thomas Southern, The Fatal Marriage (1692)

Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury (1181–1190), introduced by sir W Scott in his novel called The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Baldwin de Oyley, esquire of sir Brian de Bois Guilbert (Preceptor of the Knights Templars)—Sir W Scott Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

Balin (Sir), or "Balin le Sauvage," knight of the two swords. He was a Northumberland knight, and being taken captive, was imprisoned six months by King Arthur. It so happened that a daimsel girded with a sword came to Cunelot at the time of sir Balin's release, and told the king that no man could draw it who was tainted with "shame, treachery, or guile." King Arthur and all his knights failed in the attempt, but sir Balin drew it readily. The damsel begged him for the sword, but he refused to give it to any one. Whereupon the damsel said to him, "That sword shall be thy plague, for with it shall ye slay your best friend, and it shall also prove your own death." Then the Lady of the Lake came to the king, and demanded the sword, but sir Balin cut off her head with it, and was banished from the court. After various adventures he came to a castle where the custom was for every guest to joust. He was accommodated with a shield, and rode forth to meet his antagonist. So fierce was the encounter that both the combatants were slain, but Balin lived just long enough to learn that his antagonist was his dearly beloved brother Balan, and both were buried in one tomb.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i. 27-41 (1470).

* * "The Book of Sir Balin le Savage" is part i. ch. 27 to 41 (both inclusive) of sir T. Malory's History of Prince Arthur.

Ba'hol (Edward), usurper of Scotland, introduced in Rudyard Kipling, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, George II.).

Ba'hol (Mrs.), friend of Mr. Croftangry, in the introductory chapter of The Fair Maid of Perth, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, Henry IV.).

Ba'hol (Mrs. Martha Bethune), a lady of quality and fortune, who had a house called Bahol Lodging, Canongate, Edinburgh. At death she left to her cousin Mr. Croftangry two series of tales called The Chronicles of Canongate (q.v.), which he published.—Sir W. Scott, The Highland Widow (introduction, 1827).

Bahol College, Oxford, was founded (in 1263) by John de Bahol, knight, father of Bahol king of Scotland.

Balisar'da, a sword made in the garden of Orgagna by the sorceress Galcerina, it would cut through even enchanted substances, and was given to Rogéro for the express purpose of "dealing Orlando's death"—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso, lxxv. 15 (1516).

He knew with Balinarda's lightest blow
Nor helm nor shield nor cuirass could avail
Nor strongly tempered plate nor twisted mail

Balivervo, the basest knight in the Sireen army.—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516).

Balkor Balch ("to embrace"), Omurs, surnamed Ghil-Shah ("earth's king"), founder of the Paishadian dynasty. He travelled abroad to make himself familiar with the laws and customs of other lands. On his return he met his brother, and built on the spot of meeting a city, which he called Balk, and made it the capital of his kingdom.

Balkis, the Arabian name of the queen of Sheba, who went from the South to witness the wisdom and splendour of Solomon. According to the Koran she was a fire-worshipper. It is said that Solomon raised her to his bed and throne. She is also called queen of Sabr or An'iz.—Al Khoran, lxxv. (Sale's notes).

She fancied herself already more potent than Balkis and pictured to her imagination the genius falling prostrate at the foot of her throne.—W. Beckford Fathel.

Balkis queen of Sheba or Saba. Solomon being told that her legs were covered with hair "like those of an ass," had the presence-chamber floored with glass laid over running water filled with fish. When Balkis approached the room, supposing the floor to be water, she lifted up her robes and exposed her hairy ankles, of which the king had been rightly informed.—Jallalo 'dinn.

Bal'lenkerloch (Old), a Highland chief and old friend of Fergus M'Fior.—Sir W. Scott, Waterley (time, George II.).

Balmung, the sword of Siegfried, forged by Wieland the smith of the Scandinavian gods. In a trial of merit, Wieland cleft Amihus (a brother smith) to the waist, but so fine was the cut that Amihus was not even conscious of it till he attempted to move, when he fell asunder into two pieces.—Atchungen Lud.

Balni-Barbi, the land of projectors, visited by Gulliver.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels (1726).

Balrud'dery (The land of), a relation of Godfrey Bertram, laird of Ellangowan.—Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Balsam of Fierabras "This famous balsam," said don Quixote, "only cures three rials [about sixpence] for three quarts." It was the balsam with which the body of Christ was embalmed, and was stolen by sir Fierabras [Fī'ā'ia'brah]. Such was its virtue, that one single drop of it taken internally would instantly heal the most ghastly wound.

It is fatal to all who use it. It not only heals all wounds but even defies death itself. If thou shouldst see my body cut in two friend Sancho for some unlucky back-slash, you must carefully pick up that half of me which falls on the ground, and clove it upon the other half; be sure the blood congeals; then give me a draught of the balsam of Fierabras, and you will presently see me as sound as an orange."—Cervantes, Don Quixote I. li. 2 (1605)

Balthazar, a merchant, in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors (1593)

Balthazar, a name assumed by Portia in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice (1598)

Balthazar, servant to Romeo in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet (1597)

Balthazar, servant to don Pedro, in Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing (1600)

Balthazar, one of the three "kings" shown in Cologne Cathedral as one of the "Magi" led to Bethlehem by the guiding star. The word means "lord of treasures." The names of the other two are Melchior ("king of light") and Gaspar or Caspar ("the white one"). Klopstock, in The Messiah, makes six "Wise Men," and none of the names are like these three.

Balthazar, father of Juliana, Volante, and Zamora. A proud, peppery, and wealthy gentleman. His daughter Juliana marries the duke of Aranza, his second daughter the count Montalban, and Zamora marries signor Rinaldo.—J. Tobin The Honeymoon (1804)

Balue (Cardinal), in the court of Louis XI of France (1420-1491), introduced by sir W. Scott in Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.)

Balugantes (1 syll), leader of the men from Leon, in Spain, and in alliance with Agrament.—Arioste, Orlando in Arms (1516)

Balveny (Lord), kinsman of the earl of Douglas.—Sir W. Scott, Jan Macl of Perth (time, Henry IV.)

Balwhidder [Bāl' withis], a Scotch presbyterian pastor, filled with all the old-fashioned national prejudices, but sincere, kind-hearted and pious. He is garrulous and has his joke, but is quite ignorant of the world, being "in it but not of it"—Galt, Annals of the Parish (1821)

The J. R. Macfarlane is a fine representation of the primitive Scottish pastor: diligent, blameless, loyal and exemplary in his life but without the fiery zeal and striking eloquence of the supporters of the Covenant.—L. Chambers, English Literature II. 591

Baly, one of the ancient and gigantic kings of India, who founded the city called by his name. He redressed wrongs, upheld justice, was generous and truthful, compassionate and charitable, so that at death he became one of the judges of hell. His city in time got overwhelmed with the encroaching ocean, but its walls were not overthrown, nor were the rooms encumbered with the weeds and alluvial of the sea. One day a dwarf, named Vishnu, asked the mighty monarch to allow him to measure three of his own paces for a hut to dwell in. Baly smiled, and bade him measure out what he required. The first pace of the dwarf compassed the whole earth, the second the whole heavens, and the third the infernal regions. Baly at once perceived that the dwarf was Vishnu, and adored the present deity. Vishnu made the king "Governor of Pad'alon" or hell, and permitted him once a year to revisit the earth, on the first full moon of November.

Baly built

A city like the cities of the gods.
Enduring like a giant cliff. For many an age
Hath ocean warred against his palaces
Till overwhelmed they lie beneath the waves
Not overthrown.

Southey Curse of Pehanna xv. 1 (1800)

Ban, king of Beawick [Britanny], father of sir Launcelot, and brother of Bors, king of Gaul. His "shadowy king of a still more shadowy kingdom" came over with his royal brother to the aid of Arthur, when, at the beginning of his reign, the eleven kings leagued against him (pt. 1. 8).

Under I see the most valiant knight of the world and the man of most renown for which two brethren was king
I up and king I see are not living.—Sir T. Malory Historie of Sir Launcelet I. 14 (1470)

Banagher, a town in Ireland, on the Shannon (King's County). It formerly sent two members to parliament, and was a pocket borough. When a member spoke of a rotten borough, he could devise no stronger expression than That beats Banagher, which passed into a household phrase.

Banastar (Hunfrey), brought up by Henry duke of Buckingham, and advanced by him to honour and wealth.

He professed to love the duke as his dearest friend, but when Richard III offered £1000 reward to any one who would deliver up the duke, Banastar betrayed him to John Mitton, sheriff of Shropshire, and he was conveyed to Salisbury, where he was beheaded. The ghost of the duke prayed that Banastar's eldest son, "reft of his wits might end his life in a pigstye," that his second son might "be drowned in a dyke" containing less than "half a foot of water," that his only daughter might be a leper, and that Banastar himself might "live in death and die in life"—Thomas Sackville, A Mirrour for Magistraytes ("The Complaynt," 1587)

Banberg (The bishop of), introduced in Donnerhugel's narrative—Sir W. Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.)

Banbury Cheese Bardolph calls Slender a "Banbury cheese" (Merry Wives of Windsor, act i. sc. 1), and in Jack Drum's Entertainment we read "You are like a Banbury cheese, nothing but paring." The Banbury cheese alluded to was a milk cheese, about an inch in thickness.

Bandy-legged, Armand Gouffé (1775-1845), also called Le panard du dix-neuvième siècle. He was one of the founders of the "Caveau moderne."

Bane of the Land (Landschaden), the name given to a German robber-knight on account of his reckless depredations on his neighbours' property. He was placed under the ban of the empire for his offences.

Bango'rian Controversy, a theological paper-war begun by Dr Hoadly, bishop of Bangor, the best reply being by Law. The subject of this controversy was a sermon preached before George I., on the text, "My kingdom is not of this world."

Banks, a farmer, the great terror of old mother Sawyer, the witch of Edmonton—The Witch of Edmonton (by Rowley, Dekker, and Ford, 1658).

Ban'natyne Club, a literary club which takes its name from George Ban'natyne. It was instituted in 1823 by Sir Walter Scott, and had for its object the publication of rare works illustrative of Scottish history, poetry, and general literature. The club was dissolved in 1859.

Bannockburn (in Stirling), famous for the great battle between Bruce and Edward II., in which the English army was totally defeated, and the Scots regained their freedom (June 21, 1314).

Departed spirits of the mighty dead!
Oh, once again to Freedom's cause return
The patriot Tell the Bruce of Bannockburn
Campbell Pleasures of Hope I. (1793)

Banquo, a Scotch general of royal extraction, in the time of Edward the Confessor. He was murdered at the instigation of King Macbeth, but his son Fleance escaped, and from this Fleance descended a race of kings who filled the throne of Scotland, ending with James I. of England, in whom were united the two crowns. The witches on the blasted heath hailed Banquo as—

(1) Lesser than Macbeth, and greater
(2) Not so happy yet much happier
(3) Thou shalt get kings, though thou be none.
Shakespeare Macbeth act I. sc. 3 (1606)

(Historically no such person as Banquo ever existed, and therefore Fleance was not the ancestor of the house of Stuart.)

Ban'shee, a tutelary female spirit. Every chief family of Ireland has its banshee, who is supposed to give a warning of approaching death or danger.

Bantam (Angelo Cyrus), grand-master of the ceremonies at "Bath," and a very mighty personage in the opinion of the élite of Bath—C. Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Banting Doing Banting means living by regimen for the sake of reducing superfluous fat. William Banting, an undertaker, was at one time a very fat man, but he resolved to abstain from beer, farinaceous foods, and all vegetables, his chief diet being meat (1796-1878).

Bap, a contraction of Baphomet, i. e. Mahomet. An imaginary idol or symbol which the Femplars were accused of employing in their mysterious religious rites. It was a small human figure cut in stone, with two heads, one male and the other female, but all the rest of the figure was female. Specimens still exist.

Bap'tes (2 syl), priests of the goddess Cotyto, whose midnight orgies were so obscene as to disgust even the very goddess of obscenity (Greek, bapto, "to baptize," because these priests bathed themselves in the most effeminate manner)—Juvenal, Satires, ii. 91.

Baptista, a rich gentleman of Padua, father of Katharina "the shrew."

and Bianca—Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew (1594)

Baptisti Damiootti, a Prudian quack, who shows in the enchanted mirror a picture representing the clandestine marriage and infidelity of sir Philip Forester—Sir W Scott, Aunt Margaret's Mirror (time, William III)

Bar of Gold. A bar of gold above the instep is a mark of sovereign rank in the women of the families of the deys, and is worn as a "crest" by their female relatives

Around as princess of her father's land
A like gold bar above her instep rolled Announced her rank.

Eyron Don Juan, III. 72 (1820)

Bar'abas, the faithful servant of Rulph de Laseours, captain of the Urania. His favourite expression is "I am afraid," but he always acts most bravely when he is afraid (See BARRAUS)—E Stirling, The Orphan of the Frozen-Sea (1856)

Bar'adas (Count), the king's favourite, first gentleman of the chamber, and one of the conspirators to dethrone Louis XIII, kill Richelieu, and place the due d'Orleans on the throne of France. Baradas loved Julie, but Julie married the chevalier Adrien de Mauprat. When Richelieu fell into disgrace, the king made count Baradas his chief minister, but scarcely had he so done when a despatch was put into his hand, revealing the conspiracy, and Richelieu ordered Baradas' instant arrest—Lord Lytton, Richelieu (1839)

Barak el Hadgi, the fakir, an emissary from the court of Hyder Ali—Sir W Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Barataria, the island-city over which Sancho Panza was appointed governor. The table was presided over by Dr Pedro Rezio de Ague'ro, who caused every dish set before the governor to be whisked away without being tasted,—some because they heated the blood, and others because they chilled it, some for one evil effect, and some for another, so that Sancho was allowed to eat nothing

Sancho then arrived at a town containing about a thousand inhabitants. They gave him to understand that it was called the Island of Barataria either because Barataria was really the name of the place, or because he obtained the government barato i.e. at a cheap rate. On his arrival near the gates of the town the municipal officers came out to receive him. Presently after with certain ridiculous ceremonies they presented him with the keys of the town and constituted him perpetual governor of the island of Barataria.—Cervantes Don Quixote, II. III. 7 etc. (1615)

Barbarossa ("red beard"), surname of Frederick I of Germany (1121-1190). It is said that he never died, but is still sleeping in Kyffhäuserberg in Thuringia. There he sits at a stone table with his six knights, waiting the "fulness of time," when he will come from his cave to rescue Germany from bondage, and give her the foremost place of all the world. His beard has already grown through the table-slab, but must wait itself three round the table before his second advent (See MAVSUR, CHARLEMAGNE, ARTHUR, DESMOND, SEBASTIAN I, to whom similar legends are attached)

Like Barbarossa who sits in a cave
Taciturn sombre sedate and grave

Longfellow The Golden Legend

Barbarossa, a tragedy by John Brown. This is not Frederick Barbarossa, the emperor of Germany (1121-1190), but Hornc Barbarossa, the corsair (1475-1519). He was a renegade Greek, of Mitilene, who made himself master of Algiers, which was for a time subject to Turkey. He killed the Moorish king, tried to cut off Selim the son, but without success, and wanted to marry Zaphira, the king's widow, who rejected his suit with scorn, and was kept in confinement for seven years. Selim returned unexpectedly to Algiers, and a general rising took place, Barbarossa was slain by the insurgents, Zaphira was restored to the throne, and Selim her son married Irené the daughter of Barbarossa (1742)

Bar'bary (St), the patron saint of arsenals. When her father was about to strike off her head, she was killed by a flash of lightning

Bar'kis, the carrier who courted [Chloe] Peggotty, by telling David Copperfield when he wrote none to say to the name 'Bar' is is willin'." Clara took the hint and became Mrs. Bar' is.

For when he had given up, confirming the tip-off that people could not tell the difference between the two. The two characters are probably the same. See Dr. Brockwell's Comic 1844 (1844).

(Mrs. Quickly says of Sir John Falstaff, "A parted even just between twelve and one, 'e'en at the turning o' the tide"—Henry V act ii sc 3, 1569.)

Barlaham and Josaphat, the heroes and title of a minnesong, the object of which was to show the triumph of Christian doctrines over paganism. Barlaham is a hermit who converts Josaphat, an Indian prince. This "lay" was immensely popular in the Middle Ages, and was been translated into every European language.—Pudolf of Tins (a minnesinger, thirteenth century.)

Barley (Bill), Clara's father. Clueless, remarkable for drinking rum, and thumping on the floor—C. Dickens, Great Expectations (1850).

Barleycorn (Sir John), Malt-liquor personified. His neighbours vowed that Sir John should die, so they hired ruffians to "plough him with ploughs and bury him," thus they did, and afterwards "combed him with harrows and thrust spikes on his head," but did not kill him. Then with hooks and sickles they "cut his legs off at the knees," bound him like a thief, and left him "to wither with the wind," but he died not. The next "rent him to the heart" and having "moved him in a mor," sent two braves to beat him with clubs, and they beat him so sore that "all his flesh fell from his bones," but yet he died not. To a fire they next hauled him, and burnt him like a martyr, but he survived the burning. They crushed him between two stones, but killed him not. Sir John bore no malice for this ill-usage, but did his best to cheer the flagging spirits even of his worst persecutors.

* * * This song, from the English Duncy-Master (1651), is generally ascribed to Robert Burns, but all that the Scotch poet did was slightly to alter parts of it. The same may be said of "Auld lang Syne," "Ca' the Yowes," "My Heart is Sair for Somebody," "Green grow the Rashies, O!" and several other songs, set down to the credit of Burns.

Barlow, the favourite archer of Henry VIII. He was jocosely created by the merry monarch "Duke of Shore-ditch," and his two companions "Marquis of Islington" and "Earl of Pancras."

Barlor (Billy), a jester, who fancied himself a "mighty potentate." He was well known in the east of London, and died in Whitechapel workhouse. Some of his sayings were really witty, and some of his attitudes truly farcical.

Bar'mecide Feast, a mere dream-feast, an illusion, a castle in the air. Schacabac "the hare-lipped," a man in the greatest distress, one day called on the rich Bar'mecide, who in merry jest asked him to dine with him. Bar'mecide first washed in hypothetical water, Schacabac followed his example. Bar'mecide then pretended to eat of various dainties, Schacabac did the same, and praised them highly, and so the "feast" went on to the close. The story says Bar'mecide was so pleased that Schacabac had the good sense and good temper to enter into the spirit of the joke without resentment, that he ordered in a real banquet, at which Schacabac was a welcome guest—Arabian Nights ("The Barber's Sixth Brother").

Bar'nabas (S'), a disciple of Gamaliel, cousin of St. Mark, and fellow-labourer with St. Paul. He was martyred at Salamis, A.D. 63. St. Barnabas' Day is June 11—Acts iv 36, 37.

Bar'naby (Widow), the title and chief character of a novel by Mrs. Trollope (1839). The widow is a vulgar, pretentious husband-hunter, wholly without principle. Widow Barnaby has a sequel called The Barnabys in America or The Widow Married, a satire on America and the Americans (1840).

Barnaby Rudge, a half-witted young man, whose companion is a raven. He was allured into joining the Gordon rioters, and condemned to death, but afterwards reprieved—C. Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841). (See RUDG, BARNABY, p. 850.)

Barnacle, brother of old Nicholas Coekney, and guardian of Priscilla Tombov of the West Indies. Barnacle is a tradesman of the old school, who thinks the foppery and extravagance of the "Coekney" school inconsistent with prosperous shop-keeping. Though brusque and even ill-mannered, he has good sense and good discernment of character—The Rump (altered from Bickerstaff's Love in the City).

Barn-Burners, ultra-radicals or destructives, who burnt the barns in order to reform social and political abuses. These wiseacres were about as sapient as the Dutchman who burnt down his barns to get rid of the rats which infested them.

Barnes (1 syl), servant to colonel Manning, at Woodburne—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Barney, a repulsive Jew, who waited on the customers at the low public-house frequented by Fagin and his associates. Barney always spoke through his nose—C Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Barn'stable (Lieutenant), in the British navy, in love with Kate Plowden, niece of colonel Howard of New York. The alliance not being approved of, Kate is removed from England to America, but Barnstable goes to America to discover her retreat. In this he succeeds, but being seized as a spy, is commanded by colonel Howard to be hung to the yardarm of an American frigate called the Alacrity. Scarcely is the young man led off, when the colonel is informed that Barnstable is his own son, and he arrives at the scene of execution just in time to save him. Of course after this he marries the lady of his affection—E Fitzball, The Pilot (a burletta)

Barnwell (George), the chief character and title of a tragedy by George Lillo. George Barnwell is a London apprentice, who falls in love with Sarah Millwood of Shoreditch, who leads him astray. He first robs his master of £200. He next robs his uncle, a rich grazier at Ludlow, and murders him. Having spent all the money of his iniquity, Sarah Millwood turns him off and informs against him. Both are executed (1732)

* * * For many years this play was acted on boxing-night, as a useful lesson to London apprentices.

A gentleman called one day on David Ross (1723-1790) the actor, and told him his father who lay at the point of death greatly desired to see him. When the actor was at the bed side 17 years ago like supply the unbr took her to see your performance, which so shocked me that I vowed to break the connection and return to the path of virtue. I kept my resolution, replaced the money I had stolen and found a Maria. In my master's daughter I soon succeeded to my master's business and have bequeathed you £1000 in my will.—Felham, Chronicles of Crime

Baron (The old English), a romance by Clara Pecke (1777)

Bar'rabas, the rich "Jew of Malta." He is simply a human monster, who kills in sport, poisons whole nunneries, and invents infernal machines. Shakespeare's "Shylock" has a humanity in the very whirlwind of his resentment, but Marlowe's "Barrabas" is a mere ideal of that "thing" which Christian prejudice once deemed a Jew. (See BARANAS)—Marlowe, The Jew of Malta (1586)

Bar'rabas, the famous robber and murderer set free instead of Christ by desire of the Jews. Called in the New Testament Barab'bas. Marlowe calls the word "Barrabas" in his Jew of Malta, and Shakespeare says

Would any of the stock of Bar'rabas
Had been her husband rather than a Christian?
Merchant of Venice act iv sc. 1 (1593)

Barry Cornwall, the nom de plume of Bryan Waller Procter. It is an imperfect anagram of his name (1788-1874)

Barsad (John), alias Solomon Pross, a spy

He had an aquiline nose but not straight having a peculiar inclination towards the left cheek expression therefore sinister—C Dickens A Tale of Two Cities II 16 (1859)

Barsis'a (Santon), in the Guardian, the basis of the story called The Monk, by M G Lewis (1796)

Barston, alias captain Fenwicke, a jesuit and secret correspondent of the countess of Derby—Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Barthol'omew (Brother), guide of the two Philipsons on their way to Strasburg—Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Barthol'omew (St). His day is August 24, and his symbol a knife, in allusion to the knife with which he is said to have been slain alive.

Bartholomew Massacre, the great slaughter of the French Huguenots [protestants] in the reign of Charles IX, begun on St Bartholomew's Day, 1572. In this persecution we are told some 30,000 persons were massacred in cool blood. Some say more than double that number.

Bartholomew Pigs. Nares says these pigs were real animals roasted and sold piping hot in the Smithfield fair. Dr Johnson thinks they were the "tidy baw-pigs" made of flour with currants for their eyes. Falstaff calls himself

A little tidy Bartholomew baw pig.
2 Henry IV act II sc. 4 (1593)

Bartoldo, a rich old miser, who died of fear and want of sustenance. Fazio ruled his treasures, and at the ascension of his own wife was tried and executed — Dean Milman, Fazio (1815)

Bartole (2 syl'), a French lawyer of the fourteenth century, whose authority amongst French barristers is equal to that of Blackstone in our own courts. Hence the French proverb, He knows his "Bartole" as well as a cordelier his "Dormi". The Dormi is an anonymous compilation of sermons, for the use of the cordeliers or preaching monks.

Bartole or Bartoldo, a man who sees nothing in anything, quite used up. This is not the lawyer referred to above, but Bartoldo or Bartole, the hero of an Italian tale by Croci, and very popular in the early part of the seventeenth century. This Bartoldo was a comedian by profession, and replies to everything, "I see nothing in it." He treats kings and princes with no more ceremony than he does beggars and sweeps. From this character comes the French phrase, Resolu comme Bartole, "qui veut dire, un homme que rien ne deconcerte" — Hilaire le Gai.

Bar'tolus, a covetous lawyer, husband of Amaran'ta. — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Spanish Curate (1622)

Barton (Sir Andrew), a Scotch sea-officer, who had obtained in 1511 letters of marque for himself and his two sons, to make reprisals upon the subjects of Portugal. The council-board of England, at which the earl of Surrey presided, was daily pestered by complaints from British merchants and sailors against Barton, and at last it was decided to put him down. Two ships were, therefore, placed under the commands of sir Thomas and sir Edward Howard, an engagement took place, and sir Andrew Barton was slain, bravely fighting. A ballad in two parts, called "Sir Andrew Barton," is inserted in Percy's Reliques, II. ii. 12.

Baruch Dites, donc, allez-vous lu Baruch? Said when a person puts an unexpected question, or makes a startling proposal. It arose thus. Lafontaine went one day with Racine to l'abbaye, and was given a Bible. He turned at random to the "Prayer of the Jews," in Baruch, and was so struck with it that he said aloud to Racine, "Dites, donc, who was this Baruch? Why, do you know, man, he was a fine genius," and for some days afterwards the first question he asked his friends was, Dites, donc, Mons, allez-vous lu Baruch?

Barzillai (3 syl'), the duke of Ormond, a friend and firm adherent of Charles II. As Barzillai assisted David when he was expelled by Abner from his kingdom, so Ormond assisted Charles II. when he was in exile.

Barzillai remained with David —
In exile —

Basa-Andre, the wild woman, a sorceress, married to Basa-Jaun, a sort of vampire. Basa-Andre sometimes is a sort of land mermaid (a beautiful lady who sits in a cave combing her locks with a golden comb). She hates church bells (See BASA-JAUN).

Basa-Jaun, a wood-sprite, married to Basa-Andre, a sorceress. Both hated the sound of church bells. Three brothers and their sister agreed to serve him, but the wood-sprite used to suck blood from the finger of the girl, and the brothers resolved to kill him. Thus they accomplished. The Basa-Andre induced the girl to put a tooth into each of the foot-baths of her brothers, and, lo! they became oven. The girl crossing a bridge saw Basa-Andre, and said if she did not restore her brothers she would put her into a red-hot oven, so Basa-Andre told the girl to give each brother three blows on the back with a hazel wand, and on so doing they were restored to their proper forms — Rev W Webster, Basque Legends, 19 (1877).

Bashful Man (The), a comic drama by W. T. Moncrieff. Edward Blushington, a young man just come into a large fortune, is so bashful and shy that life is a misery to him. He dines at Friendly Hall, and makes all sorts of ridiculous blunders. His college chum, Frank Friendly, sends word to say that he and his sister Dinah, with sir Thomas and lady Friendly, will dine with him at Blushington House. After a few glasses of wine, Edward loses his shyness, makes a long speech, and becomes the accepted suitor of Dinah Friendly.

Basil, the blacksmith of Grand Pré, in Acadia (now Nova Scotia), and father of Gabriel the betrothed of L'angelme. When the colony was driven into exile in 1713 by George II., Basil settled in Louisiana, and greatly prospered, but his son led a wandering life, looking for L'angelme, and died in Pennsylvania of the plague — Longfellow, Frangelme (1849).

Ba'sile (2 syl), a calumniating, nig-gardly bigot in Le Mariage de Figaro, and again in Le Barbier de Séville, both by Beaumarchais. "Basile" and "Tartuffe" are the two French incarnations of religious hypocrisy. The former is the clerical humbug, and the latter the lay religious hypocrite. Both deal largely in calumny, and trade in slander.

Basil'ia, a hypothetical island in the northern ocean, famous for its amber. Mannert says it is the southern extremity of Sweden, erroneously called an island. It is an historical fact that the ancients drew their chief supply of amber from the shores of the Baltic.

Basilis'co, a bully and a braggart, in Solyman and Perseda (1592). Shakespeare has made "Pistol" the counterpart of "Basilisco."

Knight knight, good mother Basilisco like Shakespeare King John act I. sc. 1 (1598)

Basilus, a neighbour of Quiteria, whom he loved from childhood, but when grown up the father of the lady forbade him the house, and promised Quiteria in marriage to Camacho, the richest man of the vicinity. On their way to church they passed Basilus, who had fallen on his sword, and all thought he was at the point of death. He prayed Quiteria to marry him, "for his soul's peace," and as it was deemed a mere ceremony, they were married in due form. Up then started the wounded man, and showed that the stabbing was only a ruse, and the blood that of a sheep from the slaughter-house. Camacho gracefully accepted the desert, and allowed the preparations for the general feast to proceed.

Basilus is strong and active pitches the bar admirably wrestles with amazing dexterity and is an excellent cricketer. He runs like a buck leaps like a wild goat and plays at skittles like a wizard. Then he has a fine voice for singing, he touches the guitar so as to make it speak and handles a foil as well as any fencer in Spain. — Cervantes Don Quixote II. li. 4 (1615)

Baskerville (A), an edition of the New Testament, or Latin classics, brought out by John Baskerville, a famous printer (1706-1775)

Basrig or Bagsecg, a Scandinavian king, who with Halden or Halldene (2 syl) king of Denmark, in 871, made a descent on Wessex. In this year Ethelred fought nine pitched battles with the Danes. The first was the battle of Englefield, in Berkshire, lost by the Danes, the next was the battle of Reading, won by the Danes, the third was the famous battle of Æscsedun or Ashdune (now Ashton), lost by the Danes, and in which king Bagsecg was slain.

Bassa'nio, the lover of Portia, successful in his choice of the three caskets, which awarded her to him as wife. It was for Bassanio that his friend Antonio borrowed 3000 ducats of the Jew Shylock, on the strange condition that if he returned the loan within three months no interest should be required, but if not, the Jew might claim a pound of Antonio's flesh for forfeiture. — Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice (1598)

Bas'set (Count), a swindler and forger, who assumes the title of "count" to further his dishonest practices. — C. Cibber, The Provoked Husband (1728)

Bassia'nus, brother of Saturnus emperor of Rome, in love with Lavinia daughter of Titus Andronicus (properly Andronicus). He is stabbed by Demetrius and Chiron, sons of Tamora queen of the Goths. — (1) Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus (1593)

Bassi'no (Count), the "perjured husband" of Aurelia, slain by Alanzo. — Mrs Centlivre, The Perjured Husband (1700)

Bastard Homer was probably a bastard. Virgil was certainly one. Neoptolemos was the bastard son of Achilles by Deidamia (5 syl). Romulus and Remus, if they ever existed, were the love-sons of a vestal. Brutus the regicide was a bastard. Ulysses was probly so, Teucer certainly, and Darins gloried in the surname of Nothes

Bastard (The), in English history is William I., natural son of Robert le Diable His mother was a peasant girl of Falaise

Bastard of Orleans, Jean Dunois, a natural son of Louis due d'Orleans (brother of Charles VI.), and one of the most brilliant soldiers France ever produced (1403-1468) Beranger mentions him in his Charles Sept

Bastille The prisoner who had been confined in the Bastille for sixty-one years was A. M. Dussault, who was incarcerated by cardinal Richelieu

Bat In South Staffordshire that slaty coal which will not burn, but which lies in the fire till it becomes red hot, is called "bat," hence the expression, Warm as a bat

Bata'via, Holland or the Netherlands So called from the Bata'vians, a Celtic tribe, which dwelt there

Battai (Al), i. e. the trenchant, one of Mahomet's swords

Battle (The British Soldiers'), Inkerman, November 5, 1851

Battle of Barnet, 14th April, 1471, was certainly one of the most decisive ever fought, although it finds no place amongst professor Creasy's list of "decisive battles" It closed for ever the Age of Force, the potentiality of the barons, and opened the new era of trade, literature, and public opinion Here fell Warwick, the "king maker," "last of the barons," and thenceforth the king had no peer, but king was king, lords were lords, and commons the people

Battle of Nations, the terrible conflict at Leipzig (October 18 and 19, 1813) between Napoleon and the Allies Its issue was the defeat of Napoleon and the deliverance of Germany It is called "the Battle of Nations" not only from the number engaged therein, but also from its being the champion battle of the nations of Europe

Battle of Prague, a piece of descriptive music very popular in the first quarter of the nineteenth century It was composed by Franz Kotzwara of Prague, born 1791

Battle of Wartburg (The), the annual contest of the minnesingers for the prize offered by Hermann margraf of Wartburg, near Gotha, in Germany, in the twelfth century There is a minnesong so called, celebrating the famous contests of Walter von Vogelweide and Wolfram von Eschenbach with Heinrich von Ofterdingen Heinrich lost the former and won the latter Battle of the Giants, Mangnano, September, 1515. Francois I won this battle over the Swiss and the duke of Milan. The French numbered 26,000 men, the Swiss 20,000. The loss of the former was 6000, and of the latter 10,000. It is called "the Battle of the Giants" because the combatants on both sides were "mighty men of war," and strove for victory like giants.

Battle of the Three Emperors, Ansterlitz, 2nd December, 1805. So called because the emperor Napoleon, the emperor of Russia, and the emperor of Austria were all present. Napoleon won the fight.

Battle of the West (Great), the battle between King Arthur and Mordred. Here the king received his death-wound.

For battle of the books, of the herrings, of the moat, of the standard, of the spurs, etc., see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable.

Battles (The Fifteen Decisive), according to professor Creasy, are—

(1) Mar'athon (B.C. 490), in which the Greeks under Miltiades defeated Darius the Persian, and turned the tide of Asiatic invasion.

(2) Syracuse (B.C. 413), in which the Athenian power was broken and the extension of Greek domination prevented.

(3) Arb'ela (B.C. 331), by which Alexander overthrew Darius and introduced European habits into Asia.

(4) Metau'rus (B.C. 207), in which the Romans defeated Hannibal, and Carthage came to ruin.

(5) Armin'us (A.D. 9), in which the Gauls overthrew the Romans under Varus and established the independence of Gaul.

(6) Chalons (A.D. 451), in which Attila, "The Scourge of God," was defeated by Aetius, and Europe saved from utter devastation.

(7) Tours (A.D. 732), in which Charles Martel overthrew the Saracens, and broke from Europe the Mohammedan yoke.

(8) Hastings (A.D. 1066), by which William the Norman became possessed of the English crown.

(9) Orleans (A.D. 1429), by which Joan of Arc raised the siege of the city and secured the independence of France.

(10) Almada (A.D. 1588), which crushed the hopes of Spain and of the papacy in England.

(11) B'enhelm (A.D. 1701), in which

Marlborough, by the defeat of Tallard, broke off the ambitious schemes of Louis XIV.

(12) Pultowa (A.D. 1709), in which Charles XII of Sweden was defeated by Peter the Great of Russia, and the stability of the Muscovite empire was established.

(13) Swa'to'ga (A.D. 1777), in which General Gates defeated Burgoyne, and decided the fate of the American Revolution, by making France their ally.

(14) Valmy (A.D. 1792), in which the allied armies under the duke of Brunswick were defeated by the French Revolutionists, and the revolution was suffered to go on.

(15) Waterloo (A.D. 1815), in which Wellington defeated Napoleon and saved Europe from becoming a French province.

Battles. J. B. Martin, of Paris, painter of battle-scenes, was called by the French M des Batailles (1659-1735).

Battle for Battle-axe

The word battle seems to be used for battle-axe in this uncollected passage of the Prætorius. There broke the arrows of the bow, the shield, the sword, and the battle-axe. — Rev. J. Whitaker, Gibbon's History 10, cleaved (1731).

Battle-Bridge, King's Cross, London. Called "Battle" from being the site of a battle between Alfred and the Danes, and called "King's Cross" from a wretched statue of George IV, taken down in 1812. The historic name of "Battle-Bridge" was changed in 1871, by the Metropolitan Board, for that of "York Road." Miserable dictu'!

Battus, a shepherd of Arcadia. Having witnessed Mercury's theft of Apollo's oxen, he received a cow from the thief to ensure his secrecy, but, in order to test his fidelity, Mercury re-appeared soon afterwards, and offered him an ox and a cow if he would blab. Battus fell into the trap, and was instantly changed into a touchstone.

When Tantalus in hell sees store and staves
And senseless Battus for a touchstone serves.
Lord Brooke, Treatise on Monarchy 1v.

Bau'cis and Philemon, an aged Phrygian woman and her husband, who received Jupiter and Mercury hospitably when every one else in the place had refused to entertain them. For this courtesy the gods changed the Phrygians' cottage into a magnificent temple, and appointed the pious couple over it. They both died at the same time, according to their wise, and were converted into two trees before the temple—Greek and Roman Mythology

Bayes (1 syl), the chief character of The Rehearsal, a farce by George Villiers, duke of Buckingham (1671) Bayes is represented as greedy of applause, impatient of censure, meanly obsequious, regardless of plot, and only anxious for elaptrap The character is meant for John Dryden

* * C Dibdin, in his History of the Stage, states that Mrs Mountford played "Bayes" "with more variety than had ever been thrown into the part before"

No species of novel writing exposes itself to a severer trial since it not only resigns all Bayes' pretensions to elevate the imagination but places its productions within the range of [general] criticism.—Encyc. Brit. Art. Romance.

Dead men may rise again, like Bayes' troops, or the savages in the Pantocline In the farce above referred to a bottle is fought between foot-soldiers and great hobby-horses At last Draveansir kills all on both sides Smith then asks Bayes "How are they to go off?" "As they came on," says Bayes, "upon their legs" Whereupon the dead men all jump up alive again

Rhodes in the last scene of his Bombastes Furioso

Bayeux Tapestry, said to be the work of English damsels retained in the court of Matilda, the Conqueror's wife. When Napoleon contemplated the invasion of England in 1803, he caused this record to be removed to Paris, where it was exhibited in the National Museum. Having served its purpose, it was returned to Bayeux. The similes by Stothard were published in the Petusta Monumenta, at the expense of the Society of Antiquaries. The original is preserved in the Hôtel of the Prefecture of Bayeux (Normandy) and is called Toile de St Jean. It is coiled round a windlass, and consists of linen worked with wools. It is 20 inches broad, 214 feet long, and contains 72 compartments.

1st compartment, Edwardus Rex the Confessor is giving audience to two persons, one of whom is Harold 2nd, Harold, with a hawk in his hand (a mark of nobility) and his hounds, is on his way to Bosham 3rd, Ecclesia a Saxon church, with two figures about to enter 4th, Harold embarking 5th, The voyage to Normandy 6th, Disembarking on the coast of Normandy 7th and 8th, seizure of Harold by the count of Ponthieu 9th, Harold remonstrating with Guy, the count, upon his unjust seizure 10th to 20th, scenes connected with the sojourn of Harold at the court of William 26th, Harold swearing fidelity to William, with each hand on a shrine of relics 27th, Harold's return 28th, his landing 29th, presents himself to king Edward 30th to 32nd, the sickness of the Confessor, his death, and his funeral procession to Westminster Abbey 33rd, the crown offered to Harold 34th, Harold on the throne, and Stigant the archbishop 35th, the comet 36th, William orders a fleet to be built 55th, orders the camp at Hastings to be constructed 71st, death of Harold 72nd, duke William triumphant. Although 590 figures are represented in this tapestry, only three of them are women.

Handsome Band, Baldwin IV earl of Flanders (1160-1186)

John the Bearded, John Mayo, the German printer, whose beard touched the ground when he stood upright

Bearnaïs (Le), Henri IV of France, so called from his native province, Le Bearn (1553-1610)

Be'atrice (3 syl), a child eight years old, to whom Dantë at the age of nine was ardently attached. She was the daughter of Folco Portinari, a rich citizen of Florence. Beatrice married Simon de Bardi, and died before she was 24 years old (1266-1290). Dantë married Gemma Donati, and his marriage was a most unhappy one. His love for Beatrice remained after her decease. She was the fountain of his poetic inspiration, and in his Divina Commedia he makes her his guide through paradise.

Dantë & Beatrice and Milton's Eve
Were not drawn from their spouses you conceive.
Byron Don Juan III. 10 (1800)

(Milton, who married Mary Powell, of Oxfordshire, was as unfortunate in his choice as Dantë.)

Beatrice, wife of Ludovico Sforza

Beatrice, daughter of Ferdinando king of Naples, sister of Leonora duchess of Ferrara, and wife of Mathias Corv'us of Hungary

Beatrice, niece of Leonato governor of Messina, lively and light-hearted, affectionate and impulsive. Though wilful she is not wayward, though volatile she is not unfeeling, though teeming with wit and gaiety she is affectionate and energetic. At first she dislikes Benedick, and thinks him a suppliant conceited coxcomb, but overhearing a conversation between her cousin Hero and her gentleman, in which Hero bewails that Beatrice should trifle with such deep love as that of Benedick, and should scorn so true and good a gentleman, she cries, "Sits the wind thus? then farewell contempt Benedick, love on, I will requite you." This conversation of Hero's was a mere ruse, but Benedick had been caught by a similar trick played by Claudio. The result was they sincerely loved each other, and were married,—

Beau Brummel, George Bryan Brummel (1778-1840)

Beau Clark, a billiard-maker at the beginning of the nineteenth century. He was called "The Beau," assumed the name of Beauclerc, and paid his addresses to a protegee of Lord Fife.

Beau Fielding, called "Handsome Fielding" by Charles II, by a play on his name, which was Hendrome Fielding. He died in Scotland Yard.

Beau Hewitt was the original of Sir George Etherege's "Sir Lophing Plutter," in the comedy called The Man of Mode or Sir Fopling Plutter (1676).

Beau Nash, Richard Nash, called also "King of Bath," a Welsh gentleman, who for fifty-six years managed the bath-rooms of Bath, and conducted the balls with unparalleled splendour and decorum. In his old age he sank into poverty (1671-1761).

Beau d'Orsay (Le), father of count d'Orsay, whom Byron calls "Jeune Cupidon."

Beau Seant, the Templars' banner, half white and half black, the white signified that the Templars were good to Christians, the black that they were evil to infidels.

Beau Tibbs, in Goldsmith's Citizen of the World, a dandy noted for his finery, vanity, and poverty.

Beauclerk, Henry I king of England (1068, 1100-1135)

Beaufort, the lover of Maria Wilding, whom he ultimately marries—A. Murphy, The Citizen (a farce).

Beaujeu (Mons le chevalier de), keeper of a gambling-house to which Dalgarno takes Nigel—Sir W. Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.)

Beaujeu (Mons le comte de), a French officer in the army of the Chevalier Charles Edward, the Pretender—Sir W. Scott, Waterley (time, George II.).

Beaumains ("big hands"), a nickname which sir Key (Arthur's steward) gave to Gareth when he was a kitchen drudge in the palace. "He had the largest hands that ever man saw." Gareth was the son of king Lot and Margawse (king Arthur's sister). His brothers were sir Gawain, sir Agravaing, and sir Gaheris. Mordred was his half-brother—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i. 120 (1470).

* * His achievements are given under the name "Gareth" (q.v.).

Iennyson, in his Gareth and Lynette, makes sir Kay tauntingly address Lancelot thus, referring to Gareth

Fair and fine forsooth!
Sir fine face, sir fair hands? But see thou to it
That thine own fineness, Lancelot, some fine day
Undo thee not.

Be it remembered that Kay himself called Gareth "Beaumain" from the extraordinary size of the lad's hands, but the taunt put into the mouth of Kay by the poet indicates that the lad prided himself on his "fine" face and "fair" hands, which is not the case. If "fair hands" is a translation of this nickname, it should be "fine hands," which bears the equivalent sense of big and beautiful.

Beau'manoir (Sir Lucas), Grand-Master of the Knights Templars—Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Beaupre [Bo-pri'], son of judge Vertaigne (2 syl.) and brother of Lamira—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Little French Lawyer (1647).

Beauté (2 syl.) La dame de Beauté Agnes Sorel, so called from the château de Beauté, on the banks of the Marne, given to her by Charles VII. (1409-1450).

Beautiful (The) or La Bella. So Florence is called. France is spoken of by Frenchmen as La Belle France.

Beautiful Corisande (3 syl.), Diane comtesse de Guiche et de Grammont. She was the daughter of Paul d'Andouins, and married Philibert de Grammont, who died in 1580. The widow outlived her husband for twenty-six years. Henri IV., before he was king of Navarre, was desperately smitten by La belle Corisande, and when Henri was at war with the League, she sold her diamonds to raise for him a levy of 20,000 Gascons (1564-1620).

(The letters of Henri to Corisande are still preserved in the Bibliothèque de l'Assemblée, and were published in 1769.)

trice Cenci, daughter of a Roman nobleman, who plotted the death of her father because he violently deided her. She was executed in 1605. Shelley has a tragedy on the subject, entitled The Cenci. Guido Reni's "Portrait of Beatrice Cenci" is one of the most interesting paintings in Rome. See p. 178.

Beauty (A Thing of) is a Joy for ever—Kents.

Beauty soon grows familiar to the lover,
Fades in his eye, and pulls upon the sense.
Addison Cato l. i. (1713).

Beauty (Queen of) So the daughter of Schems'eddin' Mohammed, vizier of Egypt, was called. She married her cousin, Bed'reddin' Hassan, son of Nour'eddin' Ali, vizier of Basra—Arabian Nights ("Nouredin Ali," etc.).

Beauty and the Beast (La Belle et la Bête), from Les Contes Merveilleux of Mme. Villeneuve (1740), the most beautiful of all nursery tales. A young and lovely woman saved her father by putting herself in the power of a frightful but kind-hearted monster, whose respectful affection and melancholy overcame her aversion to his ugliness, and she consented to become his bride. Being thus freed from enchantment, the monster assumed his proper form and became a young and handsome prince.

Beauty but Skin-deep. This expression occurs in Ralph Venning's Orthodox Paradoxes.

All the beauty of the world is but skin-deep as a sun blast of death it.—3rd Edit. 41 (1650).

Beauty of Buttermere (3 syl.), Mary Robinson, who married John Hatfield, a heartless impostor executed for forgery at Carlisle in 1803.

Beauty when Unadorned Adorned the Most—Thomson, Seasons ("Autumn," 1730).

Beaux' Stratagem (The), by Geo. Farquhar. Thomas viscount Aimwell and his friend Archer (the two beaux), having run through all their money, set out fortune-hunting, and come to Lichfield as "master and man." Aimwell pretends to be very unwell, and as lady Bountiful's hobby is tending the sick and playing the leech, she orders him to be removed to her mansion. Here he and Dorinda (daughter of lady Bountiful) fall in love with each other, and finally marry. Archer falls in love with Mrs. Sullen, the wife of squire Sullen, who had been married fourteen months but agreed to a divorce on the score of incompatibility of tastes and temper. This marriage forms than 300 golden bees were discovered in 1653 Hence the emblem of the French empire

Bee, an American word recently introduced to signify a competitive examination thus—

A Spelling Bee is a company met together to compete with each other in spelling

A Husking Bee is a company assembled together to compete with each other in stripping the husks from the ears of maize

A Musical Bee is a company assembled together to compete with each other in singing or playing music "at sight," etc, etc

Bee-line, the straightest or shortest distance between two points Thus is an American expression, equivalent to "As the crow flies," but crows do not always fly in a direct line, as bees do when they seek their home

Sinners you are making a bee-line from time to eternity and what you have once passed over you will never pass over again —Dow Lay Sermons

Befana, the good fairy of Italian children She is supposed to fill their shoes and socks with toys when they go to bed on Twelfth Night Some one enters the bedroom for the purpose, and the wakeful youngsters cry out, "I'co la Befana!" According to legend, Befana was too busy with house affairs to take heed of the Magi when they went to offer their gifts, and said she would stop for their return, but they returned by another way, and Befana every Twelfth Night watches to see them The name is a corruption of Epiphania

Beg ("lord"), a title generally given to lieutenants of provinces under the grand signior, but rarely to supreme princes Occasionally, however, the Persian emperors have added the title to their names, as Hagmet beg, Alman beg, Morad beg, etc.—Selden, Titles of Honour, vi 70 (1672)

Beg (Callum), page to Fergus M'Ilvor, in Waterley, a novel by Sir W. Scott (time, George II)

Beggars (King of the), Bampfylde Moore Carew He succeeded Clauso Patch (1693, 1730-1770)

Beggar's Daughter (The) "Bessee the beggar's daughter of Bethnal Green," was very beautiful, and was courted by four suitors at once—a knight, a country squire, a rich merchant, and the son of an innkeeper at Romford She told them all they must first obtain the consent of her poor blind father, the beggar of Bethnal Green, and all slunk off except the knight, who went and asked leave to marry "the pretty Bessee" The beggar gave her for a "dot," £3000, and £100 for her trousseau, and informed the knight that he (the beggar) was Henry, son and heir of Sir Simon de Montfort, and that he had disguised himself as a beggar to escape the vigilance of spies, who were in quest of all those engaged on the baron's side in the battle of Evesham —Perey's Reliques, li 11 10

The value of money was about twelve times more than its present purchase value, so that the "dot" given was equal to £36,000

Beggar of Bethnal Green (The), a drama by S. Knowles (recast and produced, 1834) Bess, daughter of Albert, "the blind beggar of Bethnal Green," was intensely loved by Wilford, who first seen her in the streets of London, and subsequently, after diligent search, discovered her in the Queen's Arms inn at Pontford. It turned out that her father Albert was brother to Lord Woodville, and Wilford was his trustee, so that Bees was his cousin. Queen Elizabeth sanctioned their nuptials and took them under her own conduct. (See BLIND.)

Beggars Opera (T. 1) by Gay (1727). The beggar is captain Macheath (For poet, see MACHEATH).

Beggars Petition (T. 1), a poem by the Rev. Thomas Mearns, minister of Embsay Hill and Trentham, in Staffordshire. It was given to Mr. Smart, the parson of Wolverhampton—Gentleman's Magazine, lxx 41.

Béguines [Bey-gin], the earliest of all lay societies of women united for religious purposes. Brabant says the order received its name from St. Begga, daughter of Pepin, who founded it at Namur, in 695, but it is more likely to be derived from their beguins, or linen caps.

Behram, captain of the ship which was to convey prince Assad to the "mountain of Tre," where he was to be offered up in sacrifice. The ship being driven on the shores of queen Marzanna's kingdom Assad became her slave, but was recaptured by Behram's crew, and carried back to the ship. The queen next day gave the ship chase. Assad was thrown overboard, and swam to the city whence he started. Behram also was drifted to the same place. Here the captain fell in with the prince, and reconducted him to the original dungeon. Bostana, a daughter of the old fire-worshipper, taking pity on the prince, released him, and, at the end, Assad married queen Margann. Bostana married prince Amgad (half-brother of Assad) and Behram, renouncing his religion, became a Mussulman and entered the service of Amgad, who became king of the city—Arabian Nights ("Amgad and Assad").

Belarius a nobleman and soldier in the army of Cymbeline (3rd) king of Britain. Two villains having sworn to the king that he was "confering with the Romans" he was banished and for twenty years lived in a cave, but he stole away the two infants sons of the king out of revenge. Their names were Guiderius and Arviragus. When these two princes were grown to manhood, a battle was fought between the Romans and Britons, in which Cymbeline was made prisoner, but Belarius coming to the rescue, the king was liberated and the Roman general in turn was made captive. Belarius was now reconciled to Cymbeline, and presenting to him the two young men told the story, whereupon they were publicly acknowledged to be the sons of Cymbeline and princes of the realm—Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605).

Belch (Sir Toby), uncle of Olivia the rich countess of Illyria. He is a reckless rover of the old school and a friend of Sir Andrew Ague-cheek—Shakespeare Twelfth Night (1614).

Belcour, a foundling adopted by Mr. Belcour, a rich Jamaica merchant, who at death left him all his property. He was in truth the son of Mr. Stockwell, the clerk of Belcour, senior, who clandestinely married his master's daughter, and afterwards became a wealthy merchant. On the death of old Belcour, the young man came to England as the guest of his unknown father, fell in love with Miss Dudie and married her. He was hot-blooded, impulsive, high-spirited and generous, his very faults serving as a foil to his noble qualities, ever erring and repenting, offending and atoning for his offences—Cumberland The West Indian (1771).

Beled, one of the six Wise Men of the East, led by the guiding star to Jesus. He was a king who gave to his enemy who sought to dethrone him half of his Kingdom, and thus turned a foe into a fast friend—Klopstock, The Messiah, v (1747).

Belen, the mount St. Michael, in Normandy. Here nine druidesses used to tell arrows to sailors "to charm away storms." These arrows had to be discharged by a young man 25 years old.

Belerma, the lady whom D. Miranda served for seven years as a knight-errant and peer of France. When, at length, he died at Pontecallé, he prayed his cousin Montesinos to carry his heart to Belerma.

There is a picture of a beautiful dancer in mourning with a white ribbon round her waist. In the rear came a lot of white ribbons long and thin as the wind, her skirts were as large as the wings of the angels. The lady was white as the snow and her face was like a rose. Her hair was like a golden sun. Her teeth were thin set and irregular, though very white and she carried in her hand a fine linen cloth containing a heart. Montesinos informed me that this lady was Belerma.—Cervantes Don Quixote II. li. 6 (1615)

Bele'ses (3 syl), a Chaldean sooth-sayer and Assyrian satrap, who told Arba'ces (3 syl) governor of Media, that he would one day sit on the throne of Nineveh and Assyria. His prophecy came true, and Belesés was rewarded with the government of Babylon.—Bacon, Candapalus (1819)

Belfab'orac, the palace of the emperor of Illiput, in the middle of Milderdo, the metropolis of the empire.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Illiput," 1726)

Belf'ield (Brothers) The elder brother is a squire in Cornwall, betrothed to Sophia (daughter of sir Benjamin Dove), who loves his younger brother Bob. The younger brother is driven to sea by the cruelty of the squire, but on his return renews his acquaintance with Sophia. He is informed of her unwilling betrothal to the elder brother, who is already married to Violetta, but parted from her. Violetta returns home in the same ship as Bob Belfield, becomes reconciled to her husband, and the younger brother marries Sophia.—Rich Cumberland, The Brothers (1769)

Belf'ord, a friend of Lovelace (2 syl) They made a covenant to pardon every sort of liberty which they took with each other.—Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe (1749)

Belford (Mayor), the friend of colonel Tunper, and the plighted husband of Mlle Florival.—G Colman, sen, The Deuce is in Him (1762)

Belge (2 syl), the mother of seventeen sons. She applied to queen Mercilla for aid against Gervase, who had deprived her of all her offspring except five.—Spenser, Fairy Queen, v. 10 (1596)

* * "Belge" is Holland, the "seventeen sons" are the seventeen provinces which once belonged to her, "Gervase" is Philip II of Spain, and "Mercilla" is queen Elizabeth

Belgrade (2 syl), the camp-suttler, so called because she commenced her career at the siege of Belgrade. Her dog's name was Clumsey

Bel'ial, last or lowest in the hierarchy of evil (See RIVYON) Moloch was the fiercest of the infernal spirits, and Belial the most timorous and slothful. The lewd and profligate, disobedient and rebellious, are called in Scripture "sons of Belial" *

Belial came last, than whom a spirit more lewd fell not from heaven, or more gross to love Vice for itself (L. 495 e.c.) though his tongue Dropt manna and could make the worse appear The better reason but to nobler deed. Timorous and slothful.

Milton Paradise Lost li. 112 (1666).

* * Belial means "the lawless one," that is, one who puts no restraint on his evil propensities

Belia'nus of Greece (Don), the hero of an old romance of chivalry on the model of Amadis de Gaul. It was one of the books in Don Quixote's library, but was not one of those burnt by the cure as pernicious and worthless

Don Bellanis, said the curé with its two three and four parts, hath need of a dose of rhubarb to purge off that mass of bile with which he is inflamed. His Castle of Fame and other impertinences should be totally obliterated. This done we would show him lenity in proportion as we found him capable of reform. Take don Belanis home with you and keep him in close confinement.—Cervantes Don Quixote I. li. 6 (160)

(An English abridgment of this romance was published in 1678)

Belinda, niece and companion of lady John Brute. Young, pretty, full of fun, and possessed of £10,000. Heart-free marries her.—Vanbrugh, The Provoked Wife (1697)

Belinda, the heroine of Pope's Pope of the Lock. This mock heroine is founded on the following incident.—Lord Petre cut a lock of hair from the head of Miss Arabella Fermor, and the young lady resented the liberty as an unpardonable affront. The poet says Belinda wore on her neck two curls, one of which the baron cut off with a pair of scissors borrowed of Clarissa, and when Belinda angrily demanded that it should be delivered up, it had flown to the skies and become a meteor there. (See BREVIER)

Belinda, daughter of Mr Blandford, in love with Beverley the brother of Clarissa. Her father promised sir William Bellmont that she should marry his son George, but George was already engaged to Clarissa. Belinda was very handsome, very independent, most irreproachable, and devotedly attached to Beverley. When he hinted suspicions of infidelity, she was too proud to deny their truth, but her pure and ardent love instantly rebuked her for giving her lover causeless pain.—A Murphy, All in the Wrong (1761).

Belinda, the heroine of Miss Edgeworth's novel of the same name. The object of the tale is to make the reader feel what is good, and pursue it (1803)

Belinda, a lodging-house servant-girl, very poor, very dirty, very kind-hearted, and shrewd in observation. She married, and Mr Middlewick the butter-man set her husband up in business in the butter line — H. J. Byron, Our Boys (1875)

Beline (2 syl), second wife of Argan the malade imaginaire, and step-mother of Angelique, whom she hates. Beline pretends to love Argan devotedly, humours him in all his whims, calls him "mon fils," and makes him believe that if he were to die it would be the death of her. Tonette induces Argan to put these specious protestations to the test by pretending to be dead. He does so, and when Beline enters the room, instead of deploring her loss, she cries in ecstacy

Le ciel en soit loué ! Me voilà délivrée d'un grand fardeau ! de quel serait-il sur la terre ? Un homme incognito à tout le monde malpropre dégoûtant mocheant, fousant, encluant toujours, sans se prier, ennuyeux, de mauvaise humeur fatiguant sans cesse les gens et grondant jour et nuit terrifiant et valet ! (Act 1st)

She then proceeds to ransack the room for bonds, leases, and money, but Argan starts up and tells her she has taught him one useful lesson for life at any rate — Molière, Le Malade Imaginaire (1673)

Belsharius, the greatest of Justinian's generals. Being accused of treason, he was deprived of all his property, and his eyes were put out. In this state he retired to Constantinople, where he lived by begging. The story says he fastened a label to his hat, containing these words, "Give an obolus to poor old Belsharius." Marmontel has written a tale called Belshaire which has helped to perpetuate these fables, originally invented by Tzetzes or Ctesias, a Greek poet, born at Constantinople in 1120

Bélise (2 syl), sister of Philaminte (3 syl), and, like her, a femme savante. She imagines that every one is in love with her — Molière, Les Femmes Savantes (1672)

Bell (Adam), a wild, north-country outlaw, noted, like Robin Hood, for his skill in archery. His place of residence was Englewood Forest, near Carlisle, and his two comrades were Clym of the Clough [Clement of the Cliff] and William of Clondesly (3 syl). William was married, but the other two were not. When William was captured at Carlisle and was led to execution, Adam and Clym rescued him, and all three went to London to crave pardon of the king, which, at the queen's intercession, was granted them. They then showed the king specimens of their skill in archery, and the king was so well pleased that he made William a "gentleman of fee," and the two others women of the bed-chamber — Percy, Reliques ("Adam Bell," etc.), I. ii. 1

Bell (Bessy). Bessy Bell and Mary Gray were the daughters of two country gentlemen near Perth. When the plague broke out in 1666 they built for themselves a bower in a very romantic spot called Burn Bries, to which they retired, and were supplied with food, etc., by a young man who was in love with both of them. The young man caught the plague, communicated it to the two young ladies, and all three died — Allan Ramsay, The Bell and Mary Gray (a ballad)

Bell. Anne, Charlotte, and Emily Brontë assumed the noms de plume of Acton, Currer, and Ellis Bell (first half of the nineteenth century). Currer Bell or Brontë married the Rev. Arthur Bell Nicholls. She was the author of Jane Eyre.

It will be observed that the initial letter of both names is in every case preserved throughout — Acton (Anne), Currer (Charlotte), Ellis (Emily), and Bell (Brontë)

Bell (Peter), the subject of a "tale in verse" by Wordsworth. Shelley wrote a burlesque upon it, entitled Peter Bell the Third

Bell Battle (The). The casus belli was this. Have the local magistrates power to allow parish bells to be rung at their discretion, or is the right vested in the parish clergyman? This squabble was carried on with great animosity in the parish of Paisley in 1832. The clergyman, John Macnughton, brought the question before the local council, which gave it in favour of the magistrates, but the court of sessions gave it the other way, and when the magistrates granted a permit for the bells to be rung, the court issued an interdict against them.

For nearly two years the Paisley bell battle was fought with the fiercest zeal. It was the subject of every board meeting, the theme of every board the gossip at tea tables and dinner parties, and children delighted in chalking on the walls. Please to ring the bell! (May 14 1832 to Sept. 10 1833) — Westpaper paragram &c.

Douglas, great-earl of Angus, who died in 1514

The m^{rs} being much annoyed by the persecutions of a cat resolved that a bell should be hung about her neck to give notice of her approach. The measure was agreed to in full council but one of the wiser mice inquired "Who would undertake to bell the cat?" When Lauder told this tale to a council of Scotch nobles, met to declaim against one Cochran Archibald Douglas started up and exclaimed in thunder "I will" and hence the sobriquet referred to.—Sir W Scott Tales of a Grandfather, xiii.

Bells (Those Evening), a poem by T Moore, set to music, refer to the bells of Ashbourne parish church, Derbyshire — National Ans, 1

Bells (To shal'e our's), to defy, to resist, to set up one's back. The allusion is to the little bells tied to the feet of hawks. Immediately the hawks were tossed, they were alarmed at the sound of the bells, and took to flight.

Neither the king nor he that loves him best
Dare stir a wing if Warwick shake his bells.
Shakespeare 3 Henry 1 1 act sc 1 (1592)

Bells Seven bells (i.e. half-past 7), breakfast-time, eight bells (i.e. noon), dinner-time, three bells (i.e. half-past 5), supper-time

Tight bells (the highest number) are rung at noon and every fourth hour afterwards. Thus they are sounded at 12, 4, and 8 o'clock. 1 or all other parts of the day an Even number of bells announce the hours, and an Odd number the half-hours. Thus 12½ is 1 bell, 1 o'clock is 2 bells, 1½ is 3 bells, 2 o'clock is 1 bell, 2½ is 5 bells, 3 o'clock is 6 bells, 3½ is 7 bells. Again, 4½ is 1 bell, 5 o'clock is 2 bells, 5½ is 3 bells, 6 o'clock is 4 bells, 6½ is 5 bells, 7 o'clock is 6 bells, 7½ is 7 bells. Again, 8½ is 1 bell, 9 o'clock is 2 bells, 9½ is 3 bells, 10 o'clock is 4 bells, 10½ is 5 bells, 11 o'clock is 6 bells, 11½ is 7 bells. Or, 1 bell sounds at 12½, 4½, 8½, 2 bells sound at 1, 5, 9, 3 bells sound at 1½, 5½, 9½, 4 bells sound at 2, 6, 10, 5 bells sound at 2½, 6½, 10½, 6 bells sound at 3, 7, 11, 7 bells sound at 3½, 7½, 11½, 8 bells sound at 4, 8, 12 o'clock.

Bells tolled Backwards This was the tocsin of the French, first used as an alarm of fire, and subsequently for any uprising of the people. In the reign of Charles IX. it was the signal given by the court for the Bartholomew slaughter. In the French Revolution it was the call to the people for some united attack against the royalists.

Old French, toquer, "to strike," scing or sing, "a church bell"

Bella Wilfer, a lovely, wilful, lively, spoilt darling, who loved every one, and whom every one loved. She married John Rokesmith (i.e. John Harmon) — C Dickens, Our Mutual Friend (1864)

Bellamy, a steady young man, looking out for a wife "capable of friendship, love, and tenderness, with good sense enough to be easy, and good nature enough to like him." He found his beautiful in Jaemtha, who had besides a fortune of £30,000 — Dr Hoadly, The Suspicious Husband (1761)

Bella'rio, the assumed name of Euphrasia, when she put on boy's apparel that she might enter the service of prince Philaster, whom she greatly loved — Beaumont and Fletcher, Philaster or Love Lies a-bleeding (1622)

Bellaston (Lady), a profligate, from whom Tom Jones accepts support. Her conduct and conversation may be considered a fair photograph of the "beauties" of the court of Louis XV — Fielding, History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1730)

intercourse with Lady Bellaston — Encyc Brit Art, Fielding

Belle Cordiere (La), Louise Labe, who married Ennemond Perrin, a wealthy rope-maker (1526-1566)

Belle Corisande (La), Diane comtesse de Guiche et de Grammont (1551-1620)

Belle France (La), a pet name of alluding to France, similar to our Molly England

Belle the Giant. It is said that the giant Belle mounted on his sorrel horse at a place since called mount Sorrel. He leaped one mile, and the spot on which he lighted was called Wanlip (one-leap), thence he leaped a second mile, but in so doing "burst all" his girths, whence the spot was called Burst-all, in the third leap he was killed, and the spot received the name of Belle-grave

Belle's Stratagem (The). The "belle" is Letitia Hardy, and her stratagem was for the sake of winning the love of Dorecourt, to whom she had been betrothed. The very fact of being betrothed to Letitia sets Dorecourt against her, so she goes undown to him to a masquerade, where Dorecourt falls in love with "the beautiful stranger" In order to consummate the marriage of his daughter, Mr Hardy pretends to be "sick unto death," and beseeches Doricourt to wed Letitia before he dies Letitia meets her betrothed in her masquerade dress, and unbounded was the joy of the young man to find that "the beautiful stranger" is the lady to whom he has been betrothed —Mrs Cowley, The Belle's Stratagem (1780)

Bellefontaine (Benedict), the wealthy farmer of Grand Pré [Nova Scotia] and father of Evangeline When the inhabitants of his village were driven into exile, Benedict died of a broken heart as he was about to embark, and was buried on the sea-shore —Longfellow, Evangeline (1849)

Bellenden (Lady Margaret), an old Tory lady, mistress of the Tower of Titchfield

Old major Miles Bellenden, brother of lady Margaret

Miss Edith Bellenden, granddaughter of lady Margaret, betrothed to lord Lyndale, of the king's army, but in love with Morton (a leader of the covenanters, and the hero of the novel) After the death of lord Lyndale, who is shot by Balfour, Edith marries Morton, and thus terminates the tale —Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

Beller'ophon, son of Glaucos A kind of Joseph, who refused the amorous solicitations of Antea, wife of Proctos (2 syl) king of Argos Antea accused him of attempting to dishonour her, and Proctos sent him into Lycia with letters desiring his destruction Accordingly, he was set several enterprises full of hazard, which, however, he surmounted In later life he tried to mount up to heaven on the winged horse Pegasus, but fell, and wandered about the Alerian plains till he died —Homer, Iliad, vi

Bellerophon dismounted in the Alerian field
Erroneous there to wander and forlorn
Milton Paradise Lost vii 17, etc. (1665)

Letters of Bellerophon, a treacherous letter, pretending to recommend the bearer but in reality denouncing him, like the letter sent by Proctos to the king of Lycia, requesting him to kill the bearer (Bellerophon)

Pausanias the Spartan, in his treasonable correspondence with Xerxes, sent several such letters At last the bearer thought that none of the persons sent ever returned, and opening the letter found it contained directions for his own death. It was shown to the ephors, and Pausanias in alarm fled to a temple, where he was starved to death

De Lacy, being sent by king John against De Courcy, was informed by two of the servants that their master always laid aside his armour on Good Friday De Lacy made his attack on that day, and sent De Courcy prisoner to London The two servants now asked De Lacy for passports from Ireland and England, and De Lacy gave them Letters of Bellerophon, exhorting "all to whom these presents come to spit on the faces of the bearers, drive them forth as hounds, and use them as it behoved the betrayers of their masters to be treated" —Cameos of English History ("Conquest of Ireland")

Beller'ophon (4 syl), the English man-of-war under the command of captain Maitland After the battle of Waterloo Bonaparte set out for Rochefort, intending to seek refuge in America, but the Bellerophon being in sight and escape impossible, he made a virtue of necessity by surrendering himself, and was forthwith conveyed to England

Belle'rus, a Cornish giant, whence the Land's End is called Bellerium Milton in his Lycidas suggests the possibility that Edward King, who was drowned at sea, might be sleeping near Bellerium or the Land's End, on mount St Michael, the spot where the archangel appeared, and ordered a church to be built there

Sleepst [thou] by the fable of Belle'rus old
Where the great vision of the guarded mount Looks towards Nanantoes [old Castile].
Milton Lycidas 169 etc (1638)

Belleur', companion of Pinac and Mirabel ("the wild goose"), of stout blunt temper, in love with Rosalyn, a daughter of Nantolet —Beaumont and Fletcher, The Wild Goose Chase (1652)

Bellicent, daughter of Gorlois lord of Tintag'il and his wife Ygerac or Igerna As the widow married Uther the pendragon, and was then the mother of king Arthur, it follows that Bellicent was half-sister of Arthur Tennyson in Gareth and Lynette says that Bellicent was the wife of Lot king of Orkney, and mother of Gawain and Mordred, but this is not in accordance either with the chronicle or the history, for Geoffrey in his Chronicle says that Lot's wife was Anne the sister (not half-sister) of Arthur (viii 20, 21), and sir

T Malory, in his History of Prince Arthur, says

King Lot of Lothian and Orkney wedded Margawse Nentres of the land of Carlot wedded Elaine and that Morgan le Fay was [Arthur's] third sister — Pl. i 2 35 36

Bel'in, the ram, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox The word means "gentleness" (1498)

Bellingham, a man about town —
D Boucicault, After Darb

I was engaged for two years at St. James's Theatre acting Charles Surface" eighty nights Bellingham a couple of hundred nights and had two special engagements for "Mercurio" at the Lyceum. — Walter Lacy

Bellisant, sister of King Pepin of France, and wife of Alexander emperor of Constantinople Being accused of infidelity, the emperor banished her, and she took refuge in a vast forest, where she became the mother of Valentine and Orson — Valentine and Orson

Bellmont (Sir William), father of George Bellmont, a tyrannical, positive, and headstrong He imagines it is the duty of a son to submit to his father's will, even in the matter of matrimony

George Bellmont, son of Sir William, in love with Chrissa, his friend Beverley's sister, but his father demands of him to marry Belinda Blandford, the troth-plight wife of Beverley Ultimately all comes right — A Murphy, All in the Wrong (1761)

Bello'na's Handmaids, Blood, Fire, and Famine

The goddesses of warre called Bellona had these three handmaids ever attendyng on her BLOOD FIRE and FAMINE, which three daughters be of that force and strength that every one of them alone is able and sufficient to torment and afflict a proud prince and they all joynd together are of puissance to destroy the most populous countries and most richest region of the world. — *Hall
Chronicle* (1530)

Bellum (Master), war

A difference [is] twixt boyles and bloudie warres —
Yet have I shot at Maister Bellum's butte
And thrown his ball although I toucht no tittle [benefit].
G Gascoigne The Fruits of Warre 94 (died 1577)

Bellmont (Sir Robert), a proud, testy, mercenary country gentleman, friend of his neighbour Sir Charles Raymond

Charles Belmont, son of Sir Robert, a young rake He rescued Fidelia, at the age of 12, from the hands of Villard, a villain who wanted to abuse her, and taking her to his own home fell in love with her, and in due time married her
She turns out to be the daughter of Sir
Charles Raymond

Rosetta Belmont, daughter of Sir
Robert, high-spirited, witty, and affectionate She is in love with Colonel

Raymond, whom she delights in tormenting — Ed Moore, The Foundling (1748)

Belmont (Andrew), the elder of two brothers, who married Violetta (an English lady born in Lisbon), and deserted her
He then promised marriage to Lucy Waters, the daughter of one of his tenants, but had no intention of making her his wife At the same time, he engaged himself to Sophia, the daughter of Sir Benjamin Dove The day of the wedding arrived, and it was then discovered that he was married already, and that Violetta his wife was actually present

Robert Belmont, the younger of the two brothers, in love with Sophia Dove
He went to sea in a privateer under Captain Ironside, his uncle, and changed his name to Lewson The vessel was wrecked on the Cornwall coast, and he renewed his acquaintance with Sophia, but heard that she was engaged in marriage to his brother As, however, it was proved that his brother was already married, the young lady willingly abandoned the elder for the younger brother
— R Cumberland, The Brothers (1769)

Belmour (Edward), a gay young man about town — Congreve, The Old Bachelor (1698)

Belmour (Mrs), a widow of "agreeable vivacity, entertaining manners, quickness of transition from one thing to another, a feeling heart, and a generosity of sentiment" She it is who shows Mrs Love-more the way to keep her husband at home, and to make him treat her with that deference which is her just due —
A Murphy, The Way to Keep Him
(1760)

Beloved Disciple (The), St John
"the divine," and writer of the fourth Gospel — John xiii 23, etc

Beloved Physician (The), St
Luke the evangelist — Col ix 11

Belphegor, a Moribish deity, whose orgies were celebrated on Mount Phegor, and were noted for their obscenity

Belphe'be (3 syl) "All the Graces rocked her cradle when she was born"
Her mother was Chrysog'onê (4 syl), = daughter of Amphusa of fair lineage, and her twin-sister was Amoretta While the mother and her babes were asleep, Diana took one (Belphe'bê) to bring up, and Venus took the other

* * Belphe'bê is the "Diana" among women, cold, passionless, correct, and strong-minded Amoret is the "Venus," but without the licentiousness of that goddess, warm, loving, motherly, and wisely Belphœbê was a lady; Amoret a rose Belphœbê a moonbeam, light without heat, Amoret a sunbeam, bright and warm and life-giving Belphœbê would go to the battle-field, and make a most admirable nurse or lady-conductor of an ambulance, but Amoret would prefer to look after her husband and family, whose comfort would be her first care, and whose love she would seek and largely reciprocate—See Spenser, Fairy Queen, vii iv (1590)

* * "Belphœbê" is queen Elizabeth As queen she is Gloriana, but as woman she is Belphœbê, the beautiful and chaste

Either Gloriana let her choose
Or in Belphœbê fashioned to be
In one her rule in the other her rare chastitie
Spenser Fairy Queen (introduction to bk. III.)

Belted Will, lord William Howard, warden of the western marches (1563-1610)

His Billboa blade by Marchmen felt,
Hung in a broad and studded belt
Hence in rude phrase the Borderers still Called noble Howard Belted Will.
Sir W. Scott.

Belten'ebios (4 syl) Amadis of Gaul assumes the name when he retires to the Poor Rock, after receiving a cruel letter from Oriana his lady-love—Vasco de Lobaum, Amadis of Gaul, ii 6 (before 1100)

One of the most disgusting testimonies which that hero gave of his fortitude, constancy and love was his retiring to the Poor Rock when in disgrace with his mistress Oriana, to do penance under the name of Bel tenebros or the Lonely Obscure—Cervantes Don Quixote i. iii. 11 (1605)

Belvide'ra, daughter of Priuli a senator of Venice She was saved from the sea by Jaffier, eloped with him, and married him Her father then discarded her, and her husband joined the conspiracy of Pierre to murder the senators He tells Belvidera of the plot, and Belvidera, in order to save her father, persuades Jaffier to reveal the plot to Priuli, if he will promise a general free pardon Priuli gives the required promise, but notwithstanding, all the conspirators, except Jaffier, are condemned to death by torture Jaffier stabs Pierre to save him from the dishonour of the wheel, and then kills himself Belvidera goes mad and dies—Otway, Venice Preserved (1682)

We have to check our tears, although well aware that the Belvidera "with whose sorrows we sympathize is no other than our own immortal Mrs. Siddons—Sir W. Scott, The Drama

(The actor Booth used to speak in rapture of Mrs Porter's "Belvidera" It obtained for Mrs Barry the title of tamous, Miss O'Neill and Miss Helen Faucet were both great in the same part)

Ben [LEGEND], sir Sampson Legend's younger son, a sailor and a "sea-wit," in whose composition there enters no part of the conventional generosity and open frankness of a British tar His slang phrase is "D'y'e see," and his pet oath "Mess!"—W. Congreve, Love for Love (1695) I cannot agree with the following sketch—

What is Ben—the pleasant sailor which Raminler gives us—but a piece of satire—a dreary combination of all the accidents of a sailor's character his contempt of money his credulity to women with that necessary estrangement from home? We never think the worse of Ben for it or feel it as a stain upon his character—C. Lamb

C. Dibdin says If the description of Thom. Doggett's performance of this character be correct the part has certainly never been performed since to any degree of perfection

Ben Israel (Nathan) or Nathan ben Samuel, the physician and friend of Isaac the Jew—Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

Ben Jochanan, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the Rev. Samuel Johnson, who suffered much persecution for his defence of the right of private judgment

Let Hebron may let hell produce a Iran
So made for mischief as Ben Jochanan
A Jew of humble parentage was he
By trade a Levite though of low degree.

Part II

Benai'ah (3 syl), in Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for general George Edward Sackville As Benai'ah, captain of David's guard, adhered to Solomon against Adonijah, so general Sackville adhered to the duke of York against the prince of Orange (1590-1662)

Nor can Benalah's worth forgotten be
Of steady soul when public storms were high Dryden and Tate part II.

Benas'kai or Bennaskai, a wealthy merchant and magician of Delhi, —James Ridley, Tales of the Genii ("History of Mahomed," tale vii, 1751)

Benbow (Admiral) In an engagement with the French near St. Martha on the Spanish coast in 1701, admiral Benbow had his legs and thighs shivered into splinters by chain-shot, but supported in a wooden frame he remained on the quarter-deck till morning, when Du Crasse sheered off

Similar acts of heroism are recorded of Almeida the Portuguese governor of India, of Canagiro's brother of the poet Alsehylos, of Jafer the standard-bearer or "the prophet" in the battle of Muta, and of some others

Benbow, an idle, generous, free-and-easy sot, who spent a good inheritance in dissipation, and ended life in the work-house

Benbow a boon companion long approved
By joyful sets and (as he thought) beloved.
Was judged as one to joy and friendship prone
And deemed injurious to himself alone.
Crabbe Poems xvi. (1810)

Ben'demeer', a river that flows near the ruins of Chir'minar' or Istachar', in the province of Chusistan in Persia

Bend-the-Bow, an English archer at Dickson's cottage—Sir W Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I)

Benedick, a wild, witty, and light-hearted young lord of Padua, who loved celibacy, but fell in love with Beatrice and married her. It fell out thus. He went on a visit to Leonato governor of Messina, here he sees Beatrice, the governor's niece, as wild and witty as himself, but he dislikes her, thinks her pert and forward, and somewhat ill-mannered withal. However, he hears Claudio speaking to Leonato about Beatrice, saying how deeply she loves Benedick, and bemoaning that so nice a girl should break her heart with unrequited love. This conversation was a mere ruse, but Benedick believed it to be true, and resolved to reward the love of Beatrice with love and marriage. It so happened that Beatrice had been entrapped by a similar conversation which she had overheard from her cousin Hero. The end was they sincerely loved each other, and became man and wife—Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing (1600)

Benedict [BERLIONTAINE], the wealthiest farmer of Grand Pré, in Acadia, father of Evangeline ("the pride of the village"). He was a stalwart man of 70, hale as an oak, but his hair was white as snow. Colonel Winslow in 1713 informed the villagers of Grand Pré that the French had formally ceded their village to the English, that George II. now confiscated all their lands, houses, and cattle, and that the people, amounting to nearly 2000, were to be "exiled into other lands without delay." The people assembled on the sea-shore, old Benedict Bellefontaine sat to rest himself, and fell dead in a fit. The old priest buried him in the sand, and the exiles left their village homes for ever—Longfellow, Evangeline (1849)

Benefit-Play. The first actress indulged with a benefit-play was Mrs Elizabeth Barry (1682-1733)

Ben'engel'i (Cid Hamet), the hypothetical Moorish chronicler from whom Cervantes pretends he derived the account of the adventures of don Quixote

The Spanish commentators have discovered that cid Hamet Benengeli is after all no more than an Arabic version of the name of Cervantes himself. I amiel is a Moorish prefix and Benengeli signifies "son of a stag" in Spanish Cervantino—Lockhart.

Benengeli (Cid Hamet), Thomas Babington lord Macaulay. His signature in his Fragment of an Ancient Romance (1826) (See Cid, etc.)

Benevolous, in Cooper's Tas, is John Courtney Throckmorton, of Weston Underwood

Benjie (Little), or Benjamin Colthred, a spy employed by Cristal Nixon, the agent of Redgauntlet—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Ben'net (Brother), a monk at St Mary's convent—Sir W Scott, The Monastery (time, Elizabeth)

Ben'net (Mrs), a demure, intriguing woman in Amelia, a novel by Fielding (1751)

Ben'oiton (Madame), a woman who has been the ruin of the family by neglect. In the "famille Bchoiton" the constant question was "Ou est Madame?" and the invariable answer "Elle est sortie." At the dénouement the question was asked again, and the answer varied thus, "Madame has been at home, but is gone out again."—La Famille Benoiton

Ben'shee, the domestic spirit or demon of certain Irish families. The bentshee takes an interest in the prosperity of the family to which it is attached, and intimates to it approaching disaster or death by wailings or shrieks. The Scotch Bodach Glay or "grey spectre" is a similar spirit. Same is BANSHEE

How oft has the Bentshee cried!
How oft has death untied
Bright links that glory wore
Sweet bonds entwined by love!

T Moore Irish Melodies II

Bentick Street (Portman Square, London), named after William Bentinck, second duke of Portland, who married Margaret, only child of Edward second earl of Oxford and Mortimer.

Ben'volio, nephew to Montague, and Romeo's friend. A testy, litigious fellow, who would quarrel about goats' wool or pigeon's milk. Mercutio says to him, "Thou hast quarrelled with a man for coughing in the street, because he hath awakened thy dog that hath lain asleep in the sun" (act in sc 1) —Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1598)

Benwicke (2 syl), the kingdom of king Ban, father of sir Launcelot. It was situate in that extremely shadowy locality designated as "beyond seas," but whether it was Brittany or Utopia, "non nostrum fuit componere lites."

Probably it was Brittany, because it was across the channel, and was in France. Ban king of Benwicke was brother of Bors king of Gaul —Sir F. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 18 (1470).

Beowulf, the name of an Anglo-Saxon epic poem of the sixth century. It received its name from Beowulf, who delivered Hrothgar king of Denmark from the monster Grendel. This Grendel was half monster and half man and might after night stole into the king's palace called Heorot, and slew sometimes as many as thirty of the sleepers at a time. Beowulf put himself at the head of a mixed band of warriors, went against the monster and slew it. This epic is very Ossianic in style, is full of beauties, and is most interesting —Kenble's Translation.

Beppo Byron's Beppo is the husband of Laura, a Venetian lady. He was taken captive in Troy, turned Turk, joined a band of pirates, grew rich, and after several years returned to his native land. He found his wife at a carnival ball with a caricero, made himself known to her, and they lived together again as man and wife. (Beppo is a contraction of Guicciardi, as Joe is of Josiah, 1829.)

Beppo, in Fra Paolo, an opera by Auber (1836).

Beralde (2 syl), brother of Argan the medical imagination. He tells Argan that his doctor will confess this much, that the cure of a patient is a very minor consideration with them, "toute l'excellence de leur art consiste en un pompeux galimatias, en un spécieux babble, qui nous donne des mots pour des raisons, et des promesses pour des effets." —Amourettes, 15.

"presque tous les hommes meurent de leur remèdes et non pas de leurs maladies." He then proves that Argan's wife is a mere hypocrite, while his daughter is a true-hearted, loving girl, and he makes the invalid join in the dancing and singing provided for his cure —Moliere, Le Malade Imaginaire (1673).

Berch'ta ("the white lady"), a fairy of southern Germany, answering to Hulda ("the gracious lady") of northern Germany. After the introduction of Christianity Berch'ta lost her first estate and lapsed into a bogie.

Berecynthian Goddess (The) Cybele is so called from mount Berecynthus, in Phrygia, where she was held in especial adoration. She is represented as crowned with turrets, and holding keys in her hand.

Her helm is beset
Like the Berecynthian goddess crowned
With towers.

Souther's Meriel &c. ii (1814)

Berecynthian Hero (The), Midas king of Phrygia, so called from mount Berecynthus (1 syl), in Phrygia.

Berengaria queen-consort of Richard Cœur de Lion, introduced in The Zohran, a novel by sir W. Scott (1825). Berengaria died 1230.

Beinger (Sir Raymond), an old Norman warrior, living at the castle of Garde Doloureuse.

The lady Iselme Beinger, sir Raymond's daughter, betrothed to sir Hugo de Laey. Sir Hugo conceals his own betrothal in favour of his nephew (sir Dunan de Laey), who marries the lady Iselme "the betrothed" —Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II).

Beren'eo (1 syl), sister-wife of Ptolemy III. She vowed to sacrifice her hair to the gods if her husband returned home the conqueror of Asia. On his return, she suspended her hair in the temple of the war-god, but it was stolen the first night, and Canon of Samos told the king that the winds had carried it to heaven, where it still forms the seven stars near the tail of Leo, called Coma Berenices.

Pope, in his Rape of the Lock, has borrowed this fable to account for the lock of hair cut from Belinda's head, the restoration of which the young lady insisted upon.

Beren'ee (1 syl), a Jewish princess, daughter of Agrippa. She married Herod,

Ing of Chaleis, then Polemon king of Cilicia, and then went to live with Agrippa II her brother Titus fell in love with her and would have married her, but the Romans compelled him to renounce the idea, and a separation took place. Otway (1672) made this the subject of a tragedy called Titus and Berenice, and Jean Racine (1670), in his tragedy of Bérénice, has made her a sort of Henriette d'Orléans.

(Henriette d'Orléans, daughter of Charles I of England, married Philippe duc d'Orléans, brother of Louis XIV. She was brilliant in talent and beautiful in person, but being neglected by her husband, she died suddenly after drinking a cup of chocolate, probably poisoned.)

Beresina (4 syl) Every streamlet shall prove a new Beresina (Russian) meaning "every streamlet shall prove their destruction and overthrow." The allusion is to the disastrous passage of the French army in November, 1812, during their retreat from Moscow. It is said that 12,000 of the fugitives were drowned in the stream, and 16,000 were taken prisoners by the Russians.

Ber'l, a kind of crystal, much used at one time by fortune-tellers, who looked into the beril and then uttered their predictions.

and, like a prophet,

Looks in a glass that sheweth what future evils

Are now to have no successive degree,

But where they live to end.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure act I sc. 2 (1603)

Beringhen (The Seur de), an old gourmand, who preferred potties to treason, but cardinal Richelieu banished him from France, saying

Sleep not another night in Paris

Or else your precious life may be in danger

Lord Lytton Plebeian (1839)

Berinthia, cousin of Amanda, a beautiful young widow attached to colonel Lowly. In order to win him she plays upon his jealousy by coquetting with Loveless—Sheridan, A Trip to Scarborough (1777)

Berkeley (The Old Woman of), a woman whose life had been very wicked. On her death-bed she sent for her son who was a monk, and for her daughter who was a nun, and bade them put her in a strong stone coffin, and to fasten the coffin to the ground with strong bands of iron. Fifty priests and fifty choristers were to pray and sing over her for three days, and the bell was to toll without ceasing. The first night passed without much disturbance. The second night the candles burnt blue and dreadful vells were heard outside the church. But the third night the devil broke into the church and carried off the old woman on his black horse—R. Southey, The Old Woman of Berkeley (a ballad from Olaus Magnus).

Dr. Sayers pointed out to us in conversation a story related by Olaus Magnus of a witch whose coffin was confined by three chains but nevertheless was carried off by demons. Dr. Sayers had made a ballad on the subject so long ago that after seeing The Old Woman of Berkeley we awarded it the preference.—W. Taylor

Berkeley Square (London), so called in compliment to John lord Berkeley of Stratton.

Berkeley (The lady Augusta), plighted to sir John de Walton, governor of Douglas Castle. She first appears under the name of Augustine, disguised as the son of Bertram the minstrel, and the novel concludes with her marriage to De Walton, to whom Douglas Castle had been surrendered—Sir W. Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.)

Berkshire Lady (The), Miss Frances Kendrick, daughter of sir William Kendrick, second baronet, his father was created baronet by Charles II. The line, "Faint heart never won fair lady," was the advice of a friend to Mr Child, the son of a brewer, who sought the hand of the lady—Quarterly Review, cxi 205-245.

Berneja, the Insula de la Torre, from which Amadis of Gaul starts when he goes in quest of the enchantress-daamsel, daughter of Finctor the necromancer.

Bermudas, a cant name for one of the purlieus of the Strand, at one time frequented by vagabonds, thieves, and all evil-doers who sought to lie perdu.

Bernard. Solomon Bernard, engraver of Lyons (sixteenth century), called Le petit Bernard. Claude Bernard of Dijon, the philanthropist (1588-1611), is called Poor Bernard. Pierre Joseph Bernard, the French poet (1710-1775), is called Le gentil Bernard.

Bernard, an ass, in Italian Bernardo. In the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox, the sheep is called "Bernard," and the ass is "Bernard l'archiprêtre" (1498).

Bernardo, an officer in Denmark, to whom the ghost of the murdered king appeared during the night-watch at the royal castle—Shakespeare, Hamlet (1596).

Bernardo del Carpio one of the most favourite subjects of the old Spanish minstrels. The other two were The Cid and Lara's Seven Infants. Bernardo del Carpio was the person who assailed Orlando (or Rowland) at Roncesvalles, and finding him invulnerable, took him up in his arms and squered him to death, as Hercules did Antæos—Cervantes, Don Quixote, II ii 13 (1615).

* * The only vulnerable part of Orlando was the sole of the foot

Bernesque Poetry, like lord Byron's Don Juan, is a mixture of satire, tragedy, comedy, serious thought, wit, and ridicule. B. Pulci was the father of this class of rhyme (1132-1187), but Francesco Berni of Tuscany (1490-1537) so greatly excelled in it, that it is called Bernesque, from his name.

Bernitia with Deira constituted Northumbria. Bernitia included Westmoreland, Durham, and part of Cumberland. Deira contained the other part of Cumberland, with Yorkshire and Lancashire.

Bertha, the supposed daughter of Vandunke (2 syl) burgomaster of Bruges, and mistress of Goswin a rich merchant of the same city. In reality, Bertha is the duke of Brabant's daughter Gertrude, and Goswin is Ilorenz, son of Gerrard king of the beggars—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Be'iz, daughter of Burkhard duke of the Alemanni, and wife of Rudolf II king of Burgundy beyond Jura. She is represented on monuments of the time as sitting on her throne spinning.

You see the beautiful Bertha the spinner the queen of the world
Whom the role on her purple dress and gold

Bertha, alias AGATHA, the betrothed of Hereward (3 syl), one of the emperor's Varangian guards. The novel concludes with Hereward enlisting under the banner of count Robert, and marrying Bertha—Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Ber'tha, the betrothed of John of Ieden. When she went with her mother to ask count Oberthal's permission to marry, the count resolved to make his pretty vassal his mistress, and confined her in his castle. She made her escape and went to Munster, intending to set fire to the palace of "the prophet," who, she thought, had caused the death of her lover. Being seized and brought before the prophet, she recognized in him her lover, and exclaiming, "I loved thee once, but now my love is turned to hate," stabbed herself and died—Meyerbeer, Le Prophete (an opera, 1819).

Berthe au Grand-Pied, mother of Charlemagne, so called from a club-foot.

Bertold (St), first prior-general of Carmel (1073-1168). We are told in the Legende des Carmes that the godliness of this saint so spiritualized his face that it seemed actually luminous "son lince so resplissant sur sa figure qui paraissait comme environnée des rayons du soleil."

Bertoldo (Prima), a knight of Mahan, and brother of Roberto king of the two Sicilies. He is in love with Camilla "the maid of honour," but could not marry without a dispensation from the pope. While matters were at this crisis, Bertoldo laid siege to Sienna, and was taken prisoner. Camilla paid his ransom, but before he was released the duchess Aurelia requested him to be brought before her. Immediately the duchess saw him, she fell in love with him, and offered him marriage, and Bertoldo, forgetful of Camilla, accepted the offer. The betrothed then presented themselves before the king. Here Camilla exposed the conduct of the knight, Roberto is indignant, Aurelia rejects her fiancé with scorn, and Camilla takes the veil—Maid singer, The Maid of Honour (1637).

Gulio Cesare Croce, who flourished in the sixteenth century. It recounts the successful exploits of a clever but ugly peasant, and was for two centuries as popular in Italy as Robinson Crusoe is in England. (See BARTHO.)

Bertoldo's Son, Rinaldo—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

Bertram (Baron), one of Charlemagne's paladins

Bertram, count of Rousillon. While on a visit to the king of France, Helena, a physician's daughter, cured the king of a disorder which had baffled the court physicians. For this service the king promised her for husband any one she chose to select, and her choice fell on Bertram. The haughty count married her, it is true, but deserted her at once, and left for Florence, where he joined the duke's army. It so happened that Helena also stopped at Florence while on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St Jacques le Grand. In Florence she lodged with a widow whose daughter Diana was wantonly loved by Bertram. Helena obtained permission to receive his visits in lieu of Diana, and in one of these visits exchanged rings with him. Soon after this the count went on a visit to his mother, where he saw the king, and the king observing on his finger the ring he had given to Helena, had him arrested on the suspicion of murder. Helena now came forward to explain matters, and all was well, for all ended well—Shakespeare, All's Well that Ends Well (1598).

I cannot reconcile my heart to Bertram, a man noble without generosity and young without truth, who marries Helena as a coward and leaves her as a prostitute. When she is dead by his unkindness he sneaks home to a second marriage, is accused by a woman whom he has wronged, defends himself by falsehood and is dismissed to happiness.—Dr Johnson

Bertram (Sir Stephen), an austere merchant, very just but not generous. Fearing lest his son should marry the sister of his clerk (Charles Ratcliffe), he dismissed Ratcliffe from his service, and being then informed that the marriage had been already consummated, he disinherited his son. Sheva the Jew assured him that the lady had £10,000 for her fortune, so he relented. At the last all parties were satisfied.

Friedrich Bertram, only son of Sir Stephen, he marries Miss Ratcliffe clandestinely, and incurs thereby his father's displeasure, but the noble benevolence of Sheva the Jew brings about a reconciliation, and opens Sir Bertram's eyes to

"see ten thousand merits," a grace for every pound—Cumberland, The Jew (1776)

Bertram (Count), an outlaw, who becomes the leader of a band of robbers. Being wrecked on the coast of Sicily, he is conveyed to the castle of lady Imogene, and in her he recognizes an old sweetheart to whom in his prosperous days he was greatly attached. Her husband (St Aldobrand), who was away at first, returning unexpectedly is murdered by Bertram, Imogene goes mad and dies, and Bertram puts an end to his own life—C. Maturing, Bertram (1782-1820)

Bertram (Mr Godfrey), the laird of Ellangowan

Mrs Bertram, his wife

Harry Bertram, alias captain Vanbeest Brown, alias Dawson, alias Dudley, son of the laird, and heir to Ellangowan. Harry Bertram is in love with Julia Mannering, and the novel concludes with his taking possession of the old house at Ellangowan and marrying Julia.

Jucy Bertram, sister of Harry Bertram. She marries Charles Hazlewood, son of Sir Robert Hazlewood, of Hazlewood.

Sir Allen Bertram, of Ellangowan, an ancestor of Mr Godfrey Bertram.

Dennis Bertram, Donohoe Bertram, and Jeris Bertram, ancestors of Mr Godfrey Bertram.

Captain Andrew Bertram, a relative of the family—Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II.)

Bertram, the English minstrel, and guide of lady Augusta Berkely, when in disguise she calls herself the minstrel's son—Sir W. Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.)

Bertram, one of the conspirators against the republic of Venice. Having "a hesitating softness, fatal to a great enterprise," he betrayed the conspiracy to the senate—Byron, Marino Faliero (1819)

Bertram, the fiend-father of Robert le Diable. After alluring his son to gamble away all his property, he meets him near St Irenée, and Helena seduces him to join in "the Dance of Love." When at last Bertram comes to claim his victim, he is resisted by Alice (the duke's foster-sister), who reads to Robert his mother's will. Being thus reclaimed, angels celebrate the triumph of good over evil — Neverbeer, Robert of Diavolo (an opera, 1831)

Bertrand, a simpleton and a villain. He is the accomplice of Robert Macaire, a libertine of unblushing impudence, who sins without compunction — Drumier, L'Auberge des Adrets

Bertrand du Gueslin, a romance of chivalry, reciting the adventures of this countess of France, in the reign of Charles V

Bertrand du Gueslin in prison 'The prince of Wales went to visit his captive Bertrand, and asking him how he fared, the Frenchman replied, "Sir, I have heard the mice and the rats this many a day, but it is long since I heard the song of birds," i.e. I have been long a captive and have not breathed the fresh air

The reply of Bertrand du Gueslin calls to mind that of Douglas, called "The Good sir James," the companion of Robert Bruce, "It is better, I ween, to hear the lark sing than the mouse cheep," i.e. It is better to keep the open field than to be shut up in a castle

Bertulphe (2 syl), provost of Bruges, the son of a serf. By his genius and energy he became the richest, most honoured, and most powerful man in Bruges. His arm was strong in fight, his wisdom swayed the council, his step was proud, and his eye untamed. He had one child, most dearly beloved, the bride of sir Bouehard, a knight of noble descent. Charles "the Good," earl of Flanders, made a law (1127) that whoever married a serf should become a serf, and that serfs were serfs till manumission. By these absurd decrees Bertulphe the provost, his daughter Constance, and his knightly son-in-law were all serfs. The result was that the provost slew the earl and then himself, his daughter went mad and died, and Bouehard was slain in fight — S Knowles, The Provost of Bruges (1836)

Ber'wine (2 syl), the favourite attendant of lady Ermengarde (3 syl) of Baldringham, great-aunt of lady Isoline "the betrothed" — Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Beryl Mol'ozane (3 syl), the ady-love of George Geith. All beauty, love, and sunshine. She has a heart for every one, is ready to help every one, and is by every one beloved, yet her lot is most painfully unhappy, and ends in an early death — J G Trafford [J H Ridell], George Geith

Beso'nian (A), a scoundrel. From the Italian, bisognoso, "a needy person, a beggar"

Proud lords do tumble from the towers of their blood-accents, and be trod under feet of every inferior besonnan — Thomas Nash, Pierce Penniless 1's Supplication etc. (1570)

Bess (Good queen), Elizabeth (1553, 1558-1603)

Bess, the daughter of the "blind beggar of Bethnal Green," a lady by birth, a sylph for beauty, an angel for constancy and sweetness. She was loved to distraction by Wilford, and it turns out that he was the son of lord Woodville, and Bess the daughter of lord Woodville's brother, so they were cousins. Queen Elizabeth sanctioned their nuptials, and took them under her own especial conduct — S Knowles, The Beggar of Bethnal Green (1831)

Bess o' Bedlam, a female lunatic vagrant, the male lunatic vagrant being called a Tom o' Bedlam

Bessus, governor of Bactria, who seized Darius after the battle of Arlecina and put him to death. Arrian says, Alexander caused the nostrils of the regicide to be slit, and the tips of his ears to be cut off. The offender being then sent to Gebat'ina in chains, was put to death

Lo! Bessus he that arride with murder'rs a'nd
And trait'rous heart against his royal kin'
With bloody hands bereft his ma'ster's life
'Twas he that bootied him his false usurper's reign

Bes'sus, a cowardly bragging captain, a sort of Bobadil or Vincent de la Roca. Captain Bessus, having received a challenge, wrote word back that he could not accept the honour for thirteen weeks, as he had already 212 duels on hand, but he was much grieved he could not appoint an earlier day — Beaumont and Fletcher, King or No King (1619)

Fochter I despise for want of wit
For often does he aim so seldom hit
Mean in each action, leud in every limb
Manners themselves are not chieious in him
[Oh] what a Bessus he always lived!

The college porter brought in a huge quantity of that betulleous tree a native of Britain called betula alba which furnished rods for the school.—Lord W P Lennox Cheerfulness etc. i 43.

Beulah, that land of rest which a Christian enjoys when his faith is so strong that he no longer fears or doubts Sunday is sometimes so called. In Bunyan's allegory (The Pilgrim's Progress) the pilgrims tarry in the land of Beulah after their pilgrimage is over, till they are summoned to cross the stream of Death and enter into the Celestial City.

After this, I beheld untill they came unto the land of Beulah where the sun shineth night and day. Here because they were weary they betook themselves awhile to rest, but a little while soon refreshed them here, for the bells did so ring and the trumpets sounded so melodiously that they could not sleep. In this land they heard nothing raw nothing smelt nothing tasted nothing that was offensive.—Lanyan The Pilgrim's Progress i (1678).

Bev'erley, "the gamester," naturally a good man, but led astray by Stukely, till at last he loses everything by gambling, and dies a miserable death.

Mrs Beverley, the gamester's wife. She loves her husband fondly, and clings to him in all his troubles.

Charlotte Beverley, in love with Lewson, but Stukely wishes to marry her. She loses all her fortune through her brother, "the gamester," but Lewson notwithstanding marries her.—Edward Moore, The Gamester (1712-1757)

Mr Young was acting "Beverley" with Mrs Siddons. In the 4th act Beverley swallows poison and when "Jates" comes in and says to the dying man "Jates found you quarrelling with Lawson in the streets last night." Mrs Beverley replies "No I am sure he did not." To this Jates adds "And if I did—when Mrs Beverley interrupts him with "His false old man, they had no quarrel." In uttering these words Mrs Siddons gave such a piercing shriek of grief that Young was unable to utter a word from a swelling in his throat.—Campbell Life of Siddons.

Beverley, brother of Clarissa, and the lover of Bolinda Blandford. He is extremely jealous, and catches at trifles light as air to confirm his fears, but his love is most sincere, and his penitence most humble when he finds out how causeless his suspicions are. Belinda is too proud to deny his insinuations, but her love is so deep that she repents of giving him a moment's pain.—A Murphy, All in the Wrong (1761)

Young's countenance was equally well adapted for the expression of pathos or of pride, thus in such parts as Hamlet, "Beverley" "The Stranger" he looked the man he represented.—Actio Monthly (1800)

Bevil (Francis, Harry, and George), three brothers—one an M P, another in the law, and the third in the Guards—who, unknown to each other, wished to obtain in marriage the hand of Miss Grubb, the daughter of a rich stock-broker. The M P paid his court to the father, and obtained his consent, the lawyer paid his court to the mother, and obtained her consent, the officer paid his court to the young lady, and having obtained her consent, the other two brothers retired from the field — O'Brien, Cross Purposes

Be'vis, the horse of lord Marmion — Sir W Scott, Marmion (1803)

Be'vis (So) of Southampton Having reproved his mother, while still a lad, for murdering his father, she employed Saber to kill him, but Saber only left him on a desert land as a waif, and he was brought up as a shepherd. Hearing that his mother had married Mordure (2 syl), the adulterer, he forced his way into the marriage hall and struck at Mordure, but Mordure slipped aside, and escaped the blow. Bevis was now sent out of the country, and being sold to an Armenian, was presented to the king Jos'ian, the king's daughter, fell in love with him, they were duly married, and Bevis was knighted. Having slain the boar which made holes in the earth as big as that into which Curtius leapt, he was appointed general of the Armenian forces, subdued Brandamion of Damascus, and made Damascus tributary to Armenia. Being sent, on a future occasion, as ambassador to Damascus, he was thrust into a prison, where were two huge serpents, these he slew, and then effected his escape. His next encounter was with Ascupart the giant, whom he made his slave. Lastly, he slew the great dragon of Colein, and then returned to England, where he was restored to his lands and titles. The French call him Beuves de Hantone — M Drayton, Polyolhon, ii (1612)

The Sword of Bevis of Southampto was Morglay, and his steed Ar'undel. Both were given him by his wife Josian, daughter of the king of Armenia.

Bez'ahel, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for the marquis of Worcester, afterwards duke of Beaufort. As Bez'ahel, the famous artificer, "was filled with the Spirit of God to devise excellent works in every kind of workmanship," so on the marquis of Worcester —

Billings (Josh.) A. W. Shaw so signs His Book of Sayings (1866)

Billingsgate (3 syl) Beling was a friend of "Brennus" the Gaul, who owned a wharf called Beling's-gate. Geoffrey of Monmouth derives the word from Belin, a mythical king of the ancient Britons, who "built a gate there, u c 400" (1142)

Billy Barlow, a merry Andrew, so called from a semi-idiot, who fancied himself "a great potentate." He was well known in the east of London, and died in Whitechapel workhouse. Some of his sayings were really witty, and some of his attitudes truly farcical.

Billy Black, the conundrum-maker—The Hundred-pound Note

When Keeley was playing "Billy Black" at Chelmsford he advanced to the lights at the close of the piece
 "good un. Why is Dye give it up?
 Stage veteran."

Bimater ("two-mother") Bacchus was so called because at the death of his mother during gestation, Jupiter put the fetus into his own thigh for the rest of the time, when the infant Bacchus was duly brought forth.

Bimbister (Margery), the old Ranzelman's spouse.—Sir W. Scott, The Pirate (time, William III)

Bimini [Be' me nee], a fabulous island, said to belong to the Bihama group, and containing a fountain possessed of the power of restoring youth. This island was an object of long search by the Spanish navigator Juan Ponce de Leon (1460-1521)

Bind'loose (John), sheriff's clerk and banker at Marchthorn.—Sir W. Scott, St. Ronan's Well (time, George III)

Bingen (Bishop of), generally called bishop Hatto. The tale is that during a famine, he invited the poor to his barn on a certain day, under the plea of distributing corn to them, but when the barn was crowded he locked the door and set fire to the building, for which iniquity he was himself devoured by an army of mice or rats. His castle is the Mouse-tower on the Rhine.

They almost devour me with kisses
 Their arms about me entwining,
 Till I think of the bishop of Bingen
 In his Mouse-tower on the Rhine.
 Longfellow Birds of Passage

Binks (Sn. Bingo), a fox-hunting baronet, and visitor at the Spa.

Lady Binks, wife of sir Bingo, but before marriage Miss Rachael Bonnyrigg. Visitor at the Spa with her husband.—Sir W. Scott, St. Ronan's Well (time, George III)

Bi'on, the rhetorician, noted for his acrimonious and sharp sayings.

Bionis sermibus et solo nigro
 Horace Epist. II. 2. 69

Biondel'lo, one of the servants of Lucentio the future husband of Bianca (sister of "the shrew"). His fellow-servant is Tranio.—Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew (1594)

Bitch (Harvey), a prominent character in The Spy, a novel by J. I. Cooper.

Birch'over Lane (London), so called from Bireh'over, the builder, who owned the houses there.

Bird (The Little Green), of the frozen regions, which could reveal every secret and impart information of events past, present, or to come. Prince Chery went in search of it, so did his two cousins, Brightsun and Felix, last of all Fairstar, who succeeded in obtaining it, and liberating the r'nees who had failed in their attempts.—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Princess Chery," 1682)

This tale is a mere reproduction of "The Two Sisters," the last tale of the Arabian Nights, in which the bird is called "Bulbul-hezar, the talking bird."

Bud Singing to a Monk. The monk was Felix.—Longfellow, Golden Legend, ii.

Bird Told Me (A Little) "A bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter" (Eccles x 20). In the old Basque legends a "little bird" is introduced "which tells the truth." The sisters had deceived the king by assuring him that his first child was a cat, his second a dog, and his third a bear, but the "little bird" told him the truth—the first two were daughters and the third a son. This little truth-telling bird appears in sundry tales of great antiquity; it is introduced in the tale of "Princess Fairstar" (Comtesse D'Aunoy) as a "little green bird who tells everything," also in the Arabian Nights (the last tale, called "The Two Sisters").

I think I hear a bird who sings
The poor is by-and-by will be the stronger
Eyes on Der Jaan, vol. v (1871)

When Kenelm or Cenhelm was murdered by the order of his sister Cwen-thryth, "at the very same hour a white dove flew to Pome, and, alighting on the high altar of St Peter's, deposited there a letter containing a full account of the murder." So the pope sent men to examine into the matter, and a chapel was built over the dead body, called "St. Kenelm's Chapel to this day" (Shropshire).

Bire'no, the lover and subsequent husband of Olympia queen of Holland. He was taken prisoner by Cymosco king of Frizza, but was released by Orlando Bireno having forsaken Olympia, was put to death by Oberto king of Ireland, who married the young widow—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso, iv v (1516).

Bire'ro (Dute), heir to the crown of Lombardy. It was the king's wish he should marry Sophia his only child, but the princess loved Paladore (3 syl), a Breton. Birelo had a mistress named Almida, whom he induced to personate the princess, and in Paladore's presence she cast down a rope-ladder for the duke to climb up by. Bireno has Almida murdered to prevent the deception being known, and accuses the princess of immorality—a crime in Lombardy punished by death. As the princess is led to execution, Paladore challenges the duke and kills him. The villainy is fully revealed, and the princess is married to the man of her choice, who had twice saved her life.—Robert Jephson The Lax of Lombardy (1779).

Birmingham Poet (The), John Freeth, the wit, poet, and publican, who wrote his own songs set them to music, and sang them (1730-1808)

Biron, a merry mad-cap young lord, in attendance on Ferdinand king of Navarre. Biron promised to spend three years with the king in study, during which time no woman was to approach his court, but no sooner has he signed the compact, than he falls in love with Rosaline. Rosaline defers his suit for twelve months and a day, saying, "If on my favour mean to get, for twelve months seek the weary beds of people sick."

A warmer man.

Within the hour of becoming mirth,
I never spent an hour's talk without
His eye lights occur in for his wit
For every object that the eye doth catch,
The other turns to a mirth moving jest
Which his fair tongue (as once it's exposit)
Delivers in such apt and graceful words,
That aged ears may lay down at his knee,
And younger hearings are quite ravished.

Shakespeare Love's Labour's Lost, act II, sc. 1 (1611)

Biron (Charles d'Antant du de), greatly beloved by Henri IV of France. He won immortal laurels at the battles of Arques and Ivry, and at the sieges of Paris and Rouen. The king loaded him with honours: he was admiral of France, marshal, governor of Bourgogne, duke and peer of France. This too-much honour made him forget himself, and he entered into a league with Spain and Savoy against his country. The plot was discovered by Laffin, and although Henri wished to pardon him, he was executed (1602 aged 40). George Chapman has made him the subject of two tragedies, entitled Byron's Conspiracy and Byron's Tragedy (1557-1634).

Biron, eldest son of count Baldwin, who disinherited him for marrying Isabella, a nun. Biron now entered the army and was sent to the siege of Cardu, where he fell, and it was supposed died. After the lapse of seven years, Isabella, reduced to abject poverty, married Villeroy (2 syl), but the day after her espousals Biron returned, whereupon Isabella went mad and killed herself.—Thomas Southern, Isabella or the Fatal Barriera.

During the absence of the elder Margaret his son took the part of "Biron" in Isabella. The father was shocked because he desired his son for the Church, but when it was remarked to him, "In the Church your son will live and do a course of study, he will be successful, his stage will bring him in a good deal of money."—Isabella act I, sc. 1.

Biron (Harriet), the object of sir Charles Grandison's affections

One would prefer Dulcinea del Toboso to Miss Biron as soon as Grandison becomes acquainted with the amiable delicate virtuous, unfortunate Cressida Jan.—Pill of the Edin. on the history of Italy and Dorsetshire

Birth. It was lord Thurlow who called high birth "the accident of an accident"

Birtha, the motherless daughter and only child of As'tragon the Lombard philosopher. In spring she gathered blossoms for her father's still, in autumn berries, and in summer flowers. She fell in love with duke Gondibert, whose wounds she assisted her father to heal. Birtha, "in love unpractised and unread," is the bean-ideal of innocence and purity of mind. Gondibert had just plighted his love to her when he was summoned to court, for king Aribert had proclaimed him his successor and future son-in-law. Gondibert assured Birtha he would remain true to her, and gave her an emerald ring which he told her would lose its lustre if he proved untrue. Here the tale breaks off, and as it was never finished the sequel is not known.—Sir W. Davenant, Gondibert (died 1668)

Bise, a wind prevalent in those valleys of Savoy which open to the sea. It especially affects the nervous system.

Biser'ta, formerly called U'tica, in Africa. The Saracens passed from Biserta to Spain, and Charlemagne in 800 undertook a war against the Spanish Saracens. The Spanish historians assert that he was routed at Fontarabia (a strong town in Biscay), but the French maintain that he was victorious, although they allow that the rear of his army was cut to pieces.

Or whom Biserta sent from Africa shore
When Charlemagne with all his perils fell
By Fontarabia.

Milton Paradise Lost l. 635 (16-5)

Bishop Burnt milk is called by Tusser "milk that the bishop doth ban." Tyndale says when milk or porridge is burnt "we save the bishop's bath put his foot in the potte," and explains it thus, "the bishop's burn whom they lust."

Bishops The seven who refused to read the declaration of indulgence published by James II and were by him imprisoned for recusancy, were archbishop Sancroft (Canterbury), bishops Lloyd (St Asaph), Turner (Ely), Kew (Bath and Wells), White (Peterborough), Loe (Chichester), Trevelyan (Bristol)

Being tried, they were all acquitted (June, 1688)

Bishop Middleham, who was always declining against ardent drinks, and advocating water as a beverage, killed himself by secret intoxication.

Bistonians, the Thracians, so called from Biston (son of Mars), who built Bistonian on lake Bistonis.

So the Bistonian race a maddening train
Exult and revel on the Thracian plain.

Pitt's Statius ii

Bit'elas (3 syl), sister of Fairlimb, and daughter of Rukonaw the ape, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498)

Bit'ing Remark (A) Near'chos ordered Zeno the philosopher to be pounded to death in a mortar. When he had been pounded some time, he told Near'chos he had an important communication to make to him, but as the tyrant bent over the mortar to hear what he had to say, Zeno bit off his ear. Hence the proverb, A remark more biting than Zeno's.

Bit'tlebraims (Lord), friend of sir William Ashton, lord-keeper of Scotland.

Bit'zer, light porter in Bounderby's bank at Coketown. He was educated at M'Choakumchild's "practical school," and became a general spy and informer. Bitzer finds out the robbery of the bank, and discovers the perpetrator to be Tom Gradgrind (son of Thomas Gradgrind, Esq., M.P.), informs against him, and gets promoted to his place.—C. Dickens, Hard Times (1854)

Bizarre [Be zar'], the friend of Oran'ra, for ever coquetting and sparring with Durette [Dure tail], and placing him in awkward predicaments.—G. Farquhar, The Inconstant (1702)

Miss Farren's last performances were Bizarre March 25 1797 and Lily Teazle on the 23th.—Memoirs of Elizabeth Countess of Derby (1822)

Black Ag'nes, the countess of March, noted for her defence of Dunbar during the war which Edward III. maintained in Scotland (1333-1338)

She kept a stir in tower and trench
That bawling boys' rous Scottish wen.
Came I early came I late
I found Black Agnes at the gate

Sir Walter Scott says "The countess was called Black

Agnes from her complexion. She was the daughter of Thomas Randolph earl of Murray"—Tales of a Grand father 1 14 (See BLACK PRINCE.)

Black Agnes, the favourite palfrey of Mary queen of Scots

Black Bartholomew, the day when 2000 presbyterian pastors were ejected. They had no alternative but to subscribe to the articles of uniformity or renounce their livings. Amongst their number were Calamy, Baxter, and Reynolds, who were offered bishoprics, but refused the offer.

Black Bess, the famous mare of Dick Turpin, which carried him from London to York.

Black Charlie, sir Charles Napier (1786-1860)

Black Clergy (The), monks, in contradistinction to The White Clergy, or parish priests, in Russia.

Black Colin Campbell, general Campbell, in the army of George III, introduced by sir W Scott in Redgauntlet.

Black Death, fully described by Hecker, a German physician. It was a putrid typhus, and was called Black Death because the bodies turned black with rapid putrefaction—See Cornhill, May, 1865.

In 1348-9, at least half of the entire population of England died. Thus 57,000 out of 60,000 died in Norwich, 7000 out of 10,000 died in Yarmouth, 17 out of 21 of the clergy of York, 2,500,000 out of 5,000,000 of the entire population.

Between 1347 and 1350, one fourth of all the population of the world was carried off by this pestilence. Not less than 25,000,000 perished in Europe alone, while in Asia and Africa the mortality was even greater. It came from China, where fifteen years previously it carried off 5,000,000. In Venice the aristocratic died 100,000, in Florence the refined, 60,000, in Paris the gay, 50,000, in London the wealthy, 100,000, in Avignon, a number wholly beyond calculation.

N.B.—This form of pestilence never occurred a second time.

Black Douglas, William Douglas, lord of Nithsdale, who died 1390.

He was tall strong and well made of a swarthy complexion with dark hair from which he was called The Black Douglas—Sir Walter Scott, Tales of a Grand father xl.

Black Dwarf (The), of sir Walter

Scott, is meant for David Ritchie, whose cottage was and still is on Manor Water, in the county of Peebles.

Black-eyed Susan, one of Dibdin's ser-songs.

Black Flag (A) was displayed by Limerane when a besieged city refused to surrender, meaning that "mercy is now past, and the city is devoted to utter destruction."

Black George, the gamekeeper in Trollope's novel, called The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1750).

Black George, George Petrowitsch of Servia, a brigand, called by the Turks Kara George, from the terror he inspired.

Black Horse (The), the 7th Dragoon Guards (not the 7th Dragoons). So called because their facings (or collar and cuffs) are black velvet. Their plumes are black and white, and at one time their horses were black, or at any rate dark.

Black Jack, a large flagon.

But oh oh oh! his nose doth show
How oft Black Jack to his lips doth go
Simon the Cellarer

Black Knight of the Black Lands (The), sir Percival. Called by Tennyson "Night" or "Nox." He was one of the four brothers who kept the passages of Castle Dangerous, and was overthrown by sir Gareth—Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 126 (1470), Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette").

Black lord Clifford, John ninth lord Clifford, son of Thomas lord Clifford. Also called "The Butcher" (died 1461).

Black Prince, Edward prince of Wales, son of Edward III. Froissart says he was styled black "by terror of his arms" (c 169). Similarly, lord Clifford was called "The Black Lord Clifford" for his cruelties (died 1461). George Petrowitsch was called by the Turks "Black George" from the terror of his name. The countess of March was called "Black Agnes" from the terror of her deeds, and not (as sir W Scott says) from her dark complexion. Similarly, "The Black Ser," or Avinus, as the Greeks once called it, received its name from the inhospitable character of the Seythians. The "Black Wind," or Sherki, is an easterly wind, so called by the Kurds, from its being such a terrible scourge.

Black River or Atbara, of Africa, so called from the quantity of black earth brought down by it during the rains. This earth is deposited on the surface of the country in the overflow of the Nile, and hence the Atbara is regarded as the "dark mother of Egypt."

Black Sea (The), once called by the Greeks Axinus ("inhospitable"), either because the Scythians on its coast were inhospitable, or because its waters were dangerous to navigation. It was afterwards called Euxinus ("hospitable") when the Greeks themselves became masters of it. The Turks called it The Black Sea, either a return to the former name "Axinus," or from the abounding black rock.

Black Thursday, the name given in the colony of Victoria, Australia, to Thursday, February 6, 1851, when the most terrible bush fire known in the annals of the colony occurred. It raged over an immense area. One writer in the newspapers of the time said that he rode at headlong speed for fifty miles, with fire raging on each side of his route. The heat was felt far out at sea, and many birds fell dead on the decks of coasting vessels. The destruction of animal life and farming stock in this conflagration was enormous.

Blacks (The), an Italian faction of the fourteenth century. The Guelphs of Florence were divided into the Blacks who wished to open their gates to Charles de Valois, and the Whites who opposed him. Dante the poet was a "White," and as the "Blacks" were the predominant party, he was exiled in 1302, and during his exile wrote his immortal poem, the Divina Commedia.

Black'acre (Widow), a masculine, litigious, pettifogging, headstrong woman — Wycherly, The Plain Dealer (1677).

Blackhester (The countess of), sister of lord Dalgarno — Sir W. Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Blackfriars Bridge (London), was once called "Pitt's Bridge." This was the bridge built by P. Mlyn in 1780, but the name never found favour with the general public.

Blackguards (Victor Hugo says) soldiers condemned for some offence in discipline to wear their red coats (which were lined with black) inside out. The French equivalent, he says, is Blagueurs — L'Homme qui Rit, II in 1.

It is quite impossible to believe it to be the true derivation of the word. Other suggestions will be found in the Dictionary of Phrase and Fable.

Blackless (Tomalin), a soldier in the guard of Richard Cœur de Lion — Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Blackmantle (Benard), Charles Molloy Westmacott, author of The English Spy (1826).

Black'pool (Stephen), a power-loom weaver in Bounderby's mill at Coketown. He had a knitted brow and pondering expression of face, was a man of the strictest integrity, refused to join the strike, and was turned out of the mill. When Fom Gradgrind robbed the bank of £150, he threw suspicion on Stephen Blackpool, and while Stephen was hastening to Coketown to vindicate himself he fell into a shaft, known as "the Hell Shaft," and, although rescued, died on a litter. Stephen Blackpool loved Rachael, one of the hands, but had already a drunken, worthless wife — C. Dickens, Hard Times (1854).

Blacksmith (The Learned), Elhan Burritt, United States (1811-1879).

Blacksmith's Daughter (The), lock and key.

Place it under the care of the blacksmith's daughter — C. Dickens, Tale of Two Cities (1859).

Blackwood's Magazine. The vignette on the wrapper of this magazine is meant for George Buchanan, the Scotch historian and poet (1506-1582). He is the representative of Scottish literature generally.

The magazine originated in 1817 with William Blackwood of Edinburgh, publisher.

Blad'derskate (Lord) and lord Kames, the two judges in Peter Peeble's lawsuit — Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Blad'dud, father of King Lear. Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Bladud, attempting to fly, fell on the temple of Apollo, and was dashed to pieces. Hence when Lear swears "By Apollo" he is reminded that Apollo was no friend of the king's (act 1 sc 1). Bladud, says the story, built Bath (once called Badon), and dedicated to Minerva the medicinal spring, which is called "Bladud's Well."

Blair (Adam), the hero of a novel by J. G. Lockhart, entitled Adam Blair, a Story of Scottish Life (1791-1851).

Blair (Father Clement), a Carthusian monk, confessor of Catherine Glover, "the fair maid of Perth"—Sir W. Scott, Our Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV).

Blair (Lee David), Sir Richard Phillips, author of The Universal Preceptor (1816), Mother's Question Book, etc. He issued books under a legion of false names.

Blaise, a hermit, who baptized Merlin the enchanter.

Blaise (St), patron saint of wool-combers, because he was torn to pieces with iron combs.

Blanch (1 syl), one of the domestics of lady Eveline "the betrothed"—Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II).

Blanche (La reine), the queen of France during the first six weeks of her widowhood. During this period of mourning she spent her time in a closed room, lit only by a wax taper, and was dressed wholly in white. Mary, the widow of Louis XII, was called La reine Blanche during her days of mourning, and is sometimes (but erroneously) so called afterwards.

Blanche (Lady) makes a vow with lady Anne to die an old maid, and of course falls over head and ears in love with Thomas Blount, a jeweller's son, who enters the army and becomes a colonel. She is very handsome, ardent, brilliant, and fearless—S. Knowles, Old Maids (1811).

Blanche-fleur (2 syl), the heroine of Boccaccio's prose romance called Il Filocopo. Her lover "Flores" is Boccaccio himself, and "Blanche-fleur" was the daughter of King Robert. The story of Blanche-fleur and Flores is substantially the same as that of Dorchen and Arthur, by Chaucer, and that of "Diana's and Ansaldo," in the Decameron.

Blandamour (Su), a man of "mickle might," who "bore great sway in arms and chivalry," but was both vainglorious and insolent. He attacked

Britomart, but was discomfited by her enchanted spear, he next attacked sir Ferraguh, and having overcome him took from him the lady who accompanied him, "the False Florisel"—Spenser, Fairy Queen, iv 1 (1596).

Blande'ville (Judy Lindly), a neighbour of the Waverley family, afterwards married to colonel Talbot—Sir W. Scott, Waverley (time, George II).

Bland'ford, the father of Belinda, who he promised sir William Bellmont should marry his son George. But Belinda was in love with Beverley, and George Bellmont with Clarissa (Beverley's sister). Ultimately matters arranged themselves, so that the lovers married according to their inclinations—A. Murphy, All in the Wrong (1761).

Blan'diman, the faithful man-servant of the fair Belissant, and her attendant after her divorce—Valentine and Orson.

Blandina, wife of the churlish knight Ingpin, who refused hospitality to sir Calpine and his lady Screyn (canto 3). She had "the art of a surly tongue," and most engaging manners, but "her words were only words, and all her tears were water" (canto 7)—Spenser, Fairy Queen, iv (1596).

Blandish, a "practised parasite." His sister says to him, "May you find but half your own vanity in those you have to work on!" (act 1 1).

Miss Letitia Blandish, sister of the above, a fawning timeserver, who sponges on the wealthy. She especially torments Miss Alcrip "the heiress," flattering her vanity, fostering her conceit, and encouraging her vulgar affectations—General Birgowne, The Heiress (1781).

Blane (Null), town piper and pub-lican.

Jenny Blane, his daughter—Sir W. Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II).

Blaney, a wealthy heir, ruined by dissipation—Crabbe, Lough.

Blarney (Lady), one of the flesh women introduced by squire Thornhill to the Primrose family—Goldsmith, Vicar of Wakefield (1766).

Blas'phemous Balfour Sir James Balfour, the Scottish judge, was so called from his apostacy (died 1653).

Blatant Beast (Tic), the personification of sinner or public opinion The beast had 100 tongues and a sting Sir Artegal muzzled the monster, and dragged it to Faery-land, but it broke loose and regained its liberty Subsequently sir Calidore (3 syl) went in quest of it—Spenser, Faery Queen, v and vi (1596)

* * "Mrs Grundy" is the modern name of Spenser's "Blatant Beast"

Blath'ers and Duff, detectives who investigate the burglary in which Bill Sikes had a hand Blithers relates the tale of Conkev Chickweed, who robbed himself of 327 guineas—C Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Blat'tergrowl (The Rev Mr), minister of Trotcosey, near Monkbarns—Sir W Scott, The Antiquary (time, Elizabeth)

Bleeding-heart Yard (London) So called because it was the place where the devil cast the bleeding heart of lady Hatton (wife of the dancing chancellor), after he had torn it out of her body with his claws—Dr Mackay, Extraordinary Popular Delusions

Blefus'ca, an island inhabited by pigmies It was situated north-east of Lilliput, from which it was parted by a channel 800 yards wide—Dean Swift, Gulliver's Travels (1726)

Blefusca is France and the inhabitants of the Lilliputian court, which forced Gulliver to take shelter there rat up of

Bleise (1 syl) of Northumberland, historian of king Arthur's period him how it began and by whom and how it ended and who had the worst. All the battles that were done in king Arthur's days Merlin caused Bleise to write them. Also he caused him to write all the battles that every worthy knight did of king Arthur's court.—Sir T Malory History of Prince Arthur 1. 10 (1470)

Blem'myes (3 syl), a people of Africa, fabled to have no head, but having eyes and mouth in the breast (See CAORA)

Ctesias speaks of a people of India near the Ganges, sine cervice, oculos in humeris habentes Mela also refers to a people quibus capita et vultus in pectore sunt

Blenheim Spaniels The Oxford electors are so called, because for many years they obediently supported any candidate which the duke of Marlborough commanded them to return Lockhart broke through this custom by telling the people the fable of the Dog and the Wolf The dog, it will be remembered, had on his neck the marks of his collar, and the wolf said he preferred liberty

(The race of the little dog called the Blenheim spaniel, has been preserved ever since Blenheim House was built for the duke of Marlborough in 1704)

Blet'son (Master Joshua), one of the three parliamentary commissioners sent by Cromwell with a warrant to leave the royal lodge to the Lee family—Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Blifil, a noted character in Fielding's novel entitled The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1750)

* * Blifil is the original of Sheridan's "Joseph Surface," in the School for Scandal (1777)

Bligh (William), captain of the Bounty, so well known for the mutiny, headed by Fletcher Christian, the mate (1790)

Blumber (Dr), head of a school for the sons of gentlemen, at Brighton It was a select school for ten pupils only, but there was learning enough for ten times ten "Mental green peas were produced at Christmas, and intellectual asparagus all the year round" The doctor was really a ripe scholar, and truly kind-hearted, but his great fault was over-tasking his boys and not seeing when the bow was too much stretched Paul Dombey, a delicate lad, succumbed to this strong mental pressure

Mrs Blumber, wife of the doctor, not learned, but wished to be thought so Her pride was to see the boys in the largest possible collars and stiffest possible cravats, which she deemed highly classical

Cornelia Blumber, the doctor's daughter, a slim young lady, who kept her hair short and wore spectacles Miss Blumber "had no nonsense about her," but had grown "dry and sandy with working in the graves of dead languages"—She married Mr Feeder, B A, Dr Blumber's usher—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846)

Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green, Henry, son and heir of sir Simon de Montfort At the battle of Evesham the barons were routed, Mont-

fort slain, and his son Henry left on the field for dead. A baron's daughter discovered the young man, nursed him with care, and married him. The fruit of the marriage was "pretty Bessee, the beggar's daughter." Henry de Montfort assumed the garb and semblance of a blind beggar, to escape the vigilance of king Henry's spies.

Day produced, in 1659, a drama called The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green, and S. Knowles, in 1834, produced his amended drama on the same subject. There is [or was], in the Whitechapel Road a public-house sign called the Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green — History of Sign-boards.

Blind Chapel Court (Mark Lane, London), is a corruption of Blanch Appleton. In the reign of Richard II it was part of the manor of a knight named Appleton.

Blind Emperor (The), Ludwig III of Germany (880, 890-934).

John Stanley, musician and composer, was blind from his birth (1713-1786).

Blind Traveller (The), lieutenant James Holman. He became blind at the age of 25, but notwithstanding travelled round the world, and published an account of his travels (1787-1857).

Blindkinsop, a smuggler in Redgauntlet, a novel by Sir W. Scott (time, George III).

Blister, the apothecary, who says "Without physicians, no one could know whether he was well or ill." He courts Lucy by talking shop to her — Fielding, The Virgin Unmasqued.

Blithe-Heart King (The) David is so called by Cedmon.

The lovely lyrics written by his hand. Whom Saxon Cedmon calls "The Blithe heart King," Longfellow The Loet's Tale (ref. is to Psalm cxlviii. 9).

Blok (Nillel), the butcher, one of the insurgents at Liege — Sir W. Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV).

Blondel de Nesle [Neel], the favourite troubadour or minstrel of Richard Cœur de Lion. He chanted the Bloody Jest in presence of queen Berengaria, the lovely Edith Plantagenet — Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I).

Blondina, the mother of Fairstar and two boys at one birth. She was the wife of a king, but the queen-mother hated her, and taking away the three babes substituted three puppies. Ultimately, her children were restored to her, and the queen-mother with her accomplices were duly punished — Comtesse D'Annoy, Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Blood (Colonel Thomas), emissary of the duke of Buckingham (1628-1680), introduced by Sir W. Scott in Perceval of the Pool, a novel (time, Charles II).

Blood-Bath (1520), a massacre of the Swedish nobles and leaders, which occurred three days after the coronation of Christian II king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. The victims were invited to attend the coronation, and were put to the sword, under the plea of being enemies of the true Church. In this massacre fell both the father and brother-in-law of Gustavus Vasa. The former was named Eric Johansson, and the latter Brabe (2 syl).

This massacre reminds us of the "Bloody Wedding," or slaughter of hugenots during the marriage ceremonies of Henri of Navarre and Margaret of France, in 1572.

Bloods (The Five) (1) The O'Neils of Ulster (2) the O'Connors of Connaught, (3) the O'Briens of Thomond, (4) the O'Lachlans of Meath, and (5) the McMurroughs of Leinster. These are the five principal septs or families of Ireland, and all not belonging to one of these five septs are accounted aliens or enemies, and could "neither sue nor be sued," even down to the reign of Elizabeth

William Fitz-Roger, being arraigned (4th Edward II) for the murder of Roger de Cantillon, pleads that he was not guilty of felony, because his victim was not of "free blood," i.e. one of the "five bloods of Ireland" The plea is admitted by the jury to be good

Robertus de Waler tried at Waterford for slaying John McCillimory in the time of Edward II. confessed the fact but pleaded that he could not thereby have committed felony, because the deceased was a mere Irish man and not one of the five bloods.—Sir John Davies.

Bloody (The), Otho II emperor of Germany (955, 973-983)

Bloody-Bones, a bogie

As bad as Bloody bones or Lunsford (He is the Thomas Lunsford governor of the Tower the dread of every one) —S. Butler Audubus

Bloody Brother (The), a tragedy by Beaumont and Fletcher (1639) The "bloody brother" is Rollo duke of Normandy, who kills his brother Otto and several other persons, but is himself killed ultimately by Hamond captain of the guard

Bloody Butcher (The), the duke of Cumberland, second son of George II, so called from his barbarities in the suppression of the rebellion in favour of Charles Edward, the young pretender "Black Clifford" was also called "The Butcher" for his cruelties (died 1461)

Bloody Hand, Cathal, an ancestor of the O Connors of Ireland

Bloody Mary, queen Mary of England, daughter of Henry VIII and elder half-sister of queen Elizabeth So called on account of the sanguinary persecutions carried on by her against the protestants. It is said that 200 persons were burnt to death in her short reign (1516, 1553-1558)

Bloody Wedding (The), that of Henri of Navarre with Margueret, sister of Charles IX of France Catherine de Medicis invited all the chief protestant nobles to this wedding, but on the eve of the festival of St Bartholomew (August 24, 1572), a general onslaught was made on all the protestants of Paris, and next day the same massacre was extended to the provinces The number which fell in this wholesale slaughter has been estimated at between 30,000 and 40,000 persons of both sexes

engaged to Lord Totterly the beau of 60, but in love with Charles Danvers the embryo barrister—C Selby, The Unfinished Gentleman

Blount (Nicholas), afterwards knighted, master of the horse to the earl of Sussex—Sir W Scott, Kennilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Blount (Sir Frederick), a distant relative of Sir John Vesey He had a great objection to the letter t, which he considered "wough and wansping" He dressed to perfection, and though not "rich," prided himself on having the "best opewash-box, the best dogs, the best horses, and the best house" of any one He liked Georgynn Vesey, and as she had £10,000 he thought he should do himself no harm by "marrying the girl"—Lord L Bulwer Lutten, Money (1810)

Blount (Master), a wealthy jeweller of Ludgate Hill, London An old-fashioned tradesman, not ashamed of his calling He had two sons, John and Thomas, the former was his favourite

Mistress Blount, his wife A shrewd, discerning woman, who loved her son Thomas, and saw in him the elements of a rising man

John Blount, eldest son of the Ludgate jeweller Being left successor to his father, he sold the goods and set up for a man of fashion and fortune His vanity and snobbery were most gross He had good-nature, but more cunning than discretion, thought himself far-seeing, but was most easily duped "The phaeton was built after my design, my lord," he says, "mayhap your lordship has seen it" "My taste is driving, my lord, mayhap your lordship has seen me handle the ribbons" "My horses are all bloods, mayhap your lordship has noticed my team" "I pride myself on my seat in the saddle, mayhap your lordship has seen me ride" "If I am superlative in anything, 'tis in my wines" "So please your ladyship, 'tis dress I most excel in 'tis walking I pride myself in"

No matter what is mentioned, 'tis the one thing he did or had better than any one else This conceited fool was duped into believing a parcel of men servants to be lords and dukes, and made love to a lady's maid, supposing her to be a countess

Thomas Blount, John's brother, and one of nature's gentlemen He entered the army, became a colonel, and married lady Blanche He is described as having "a lofty forehead for princely thought to dwell in, eyes for love or war, a nose of Grecian mould with touch of Rome, a mouth like Cupid's bow, ambitious chin dimpled and knobbed"—S Knowles, Old Maids (1841)

Blouzelin'da or Blouzelinda, a shepherdess in love with Lobbin Clout, in The Shepherd's Week

My Blouzelinda is the blithest lass
Than primrose sweeter or the clover grass
My Blouzelinda's than gilliflowers more fair
Than daisies, marygold or kingcup rare.
GAY Pastoral 1 (1714).

Sweet is my toll when Blouzelind is near
Of her benefit this winter all the year
Come Blouzelinda, ease thy swain's desire
My summer's shadow and my winter's fire

Blucher was nicknamed "Marshal Forwards" for his dash and readiness in the campaign of 1813

Blue (Dark), Oxford boat crew (See BOAT COLOURS)

Blue (Light), Cambridge boat crew (See BOAT COLOURS)

Blue (True) When it is said that anything or person is True blue or True as Country blue, the reference is to a blue cloth and blue thread made in Coventry, noted for its fast colour. Lincoln was no less famous for its green cloth and dye

True Blue has also reference to untainted aristocratic descent. This is derived from the Spanish notion that the really high bred have bluer blood than those of meaner race. Hence the French phrases, Sang bleu ("aristocratic blood"), Sang noir ("plebeian blood"), etc

Blue Beard (La Barbe Bleue), from the contes of Charles Perrault (1697). The chevalier Raoul is a merciless tyrant, with a blue beard. His young wife is entrusted with all the keys of the castle, with strict injunctions on pain of death not to open one special room. During the absence of her lord the "forbidden fruit" is too tempting to be resisted, the door is opened, and the young wife finds the floor covered with the dead bodies of her husband's former wives. She drops the key in her terror, and can by no means obliterate from it the stain of blood. Blue Beard, on his return, commands her to prepare for death, but by the timely arrival of her brothers her life is saved and Blue Beard put to death

Dr C Taylor thinks Blue Beard is a type of the castle-lords in the days of knight-errantry. Some say Henry VIII (the noted wife-killer) was the "academic figure." Others think it was Giles de Retz, marquis de Laval, marshal of France in 1429, who (according to Mezerai) murdered six of his seven wives, and was ultimately strangled in 1440

Another solution is that Blue Beard was count Conomar, and the young wife Triphyna, daughter of count Guerech. Count Conomar was lieutenant of Brittany in the reign of Childebert. M Hippolyte Vieille assures us that in 1850, during the repairs of the chapel of St Nicolas de Bieuzy, some ancient frescoes were discovered with scenes from the life of St Triphyna: (1) The marriage, (2) the husband taking leave of his young wife and entrusting to her a key, (3) a room with an open door, through which are seen the corpses of seven women hanging, (4) the husband threatening his wife, while another female [sister Anne] is looking out of a window above, (5) the husband has placed a halter round the neck of his victim, but the friends, accompanied by St Gildas, abbot of Rhévy in Brittany, arrive just in time to rescue the future saint—Peccages de Bretagne

(Ludwig Tieck brought out a drama in Berlin, on the story of Blue Beard. The incident about the keys and the doors is similar to that mentioned by "The Third Cinderella" in the Arabian Nights. The forty princesses were absent for forty days, and gave king Agib the keys of the palace during their absence. He had leave to enter every room but one. His curiosity led him to open the forbidden chamber and mount a horse which he saw there. The horse carried him through the air far from the palace, and with a whisk of its tail knocked out his right eye. The same misfortune had befallen ten other princes, who warned him of the danger before he started.)

Blue Flag (A) in the Roman empire was warning of danger. Livy speaks of it in his Annals

Blue-Gowns King's bedesmen, or privileged Scotch mendicants, were so called from their dress. On the king's birthday each of these bedesmen had given to him a cloak of blue cloth, a

("The Cat" is Catesby, and "the Rat" Ratacliff)

Boar (The Blue) This public-house sign (Westminster) is the badge of the Veres earls of Oxford

The Blue Boar Lane (St Nicholas, Leicester) is so named from the cognizance of Richard III, because he slept there the night before the battle of Bosworth Field

Boar of Ardennes (The Wild), in French Le Sanglier des Ardennes (2 syl), was Guillaume comte de la March, so called because he was as fierce as the wild boar he delighted to hunt. The character is introduced by Sir W Scott in Quentin Durward, under the name of "William count of la Marek"

Boar's Head (The) This tavern, immortalized by Shakespeare, stood in Ratcliff (London), on the site of the present statue of William IV. It was the cognizance of the Gordons, who adopted it because one of their progenitors slew, in the forest of Huntley, a wild boar, the terror of all the Merse (1093)

Boaz and Jachin, two brazen pillars set up by Solomon at the entrance of the temple built by him. Boaz, which means "strength," was on the left hand, and Jachin, which means "stability," on the right —1 Kings vi 21

(The names of these two pillars are adopted in the craft called "Free Masonry")

Bob'adil, an ignorant, clever, shallow bully, thoroughly cowardly, but thought by his dupes to be an amazing hero. He lodged with Cob (the water-carrier) and his wife Tib. Master Stephen was greatly struck with his "dainty orths," such as "By the foot of Pharaoh!" "Body of Cesar!" "As I am a gentle man and a soldier!" His device to save the expense of a standing army is inimitable for its conceit and absurdity

I would select 10 more to myself throughout the land gentlemen they should be of a good spirit and able constitution. I would choose them by an instinct, and I would teach them the peccol rules till they could play [sense] very near as well as myself. This done say the enemy were 40 000 strong, we 20 would challenge 20 of the enemy kill them challenge 20 more kill them 20 more kill them too every man his 10 a day that's 10 score 200 a day five day a thousand 40 000 40 times 5 200 days kill them all. —Ben Jonson Every Man in His Humour iv 7 (1630)

Since his Henry Woodward 1717-1777 time this part of Bobadil has never been justly performed. It may be said to have died with him. —Dr Dorn

The name was probably suggested by Bobadilla first governor of Cuba, who superseded Columbus sent home in chains on a most frivolous charge. Similar characters are "Metamore" and "Scaramouch" (Molière), "Parolles" (Shakespeare) and "Pistol" (Shakespeare), "Bessus" (Beaumont and Fletcher) (See also Basilisco, Borougholmi, Caitain Bravln, Caitain Noll Blum, Sir Pitrovel Flash, Sacripant, Vincent de la Rose, etc.)

Bodach Glay or "Grey Speetre," a house demon of the Scotch, similar to the Irish banshee

Bœ'mond, the Christian king of Antioch, who tried to teach his subjects arts, law, and religion. He is of the Norman race, Roger's brother, and son of Roberto Guiscard — Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

Bœotian Ears, ears unable to appreciate music and rhetoric. Bœotia was laughed at by the Athenians for the dullness and stupidity of its inhabitants.

This is having taste and sentiment. Well friend I assure thee thou hast not got Bœotian ears" (because he praised certain extracts read to him by an author). — Leage Gill Blas vii. 3 (1715)

Bœuf (Bont de), a gigantic ferocious follower of prince John — Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

Boffin (Nicodemus), "the golden dustman," foreman of old John Harmon, dustman and miser. He was "a broad, round-shouldered, one-sided old fellow, whose face was of the rhinoceros build, with over-lapping ears." A kind, shrewd man was Mr Boffin, devoted to his wife, whom he greatly admired. Being residuary legatee of John Harmon, dustman, he came in for £100,000. Afterwards, John Harmon, the son, being discovered, Mr Boffin surrendered the property to him, and lived with him.

Mrs Boffin, wife of Mr N Boffin, and daughter of a cat's-meat man. She was a fat, smiling, good-tempered creature, the servant of old John Harmon, dustman and miser, and very kind to the miser's son (young John Harmon). After Mr Boffin came into his fortune she became "a high flyer at fashion," wore black velvet and sable, but retained her kindness of heart and love for her husband. She was devoted to Bella Wilfer, who ultimately became the wife of young John Harmon, alias Rokesmith — C Dickens, Our Mutual Friend (1864)

Bo'gio, one of the allies of Charlemagne. He promised his wife to return within six months, but was slain by Dardinello — Arnosto, Orlando Furioso (1516) swindling scheme, concocted at Paris by fourteen sharpers, who expected to clear by it at least a million sterling. This swindle was exposed by O'Reilly in the Times newspaper, and the corporation of London thanked the proprietors of that journal for their public services.

Bo'gus, sham, forged, fraudulent, as bogus currency, bogus transactions, said to be a corruption of Borghese, a swindler, who supplied the North American States with counterfeit bills, bills on fictitious banks, and sham mortgages — Boston Daily Courier

Some think the word a corruption of [Hoecus] Pocus, and say that it refers to the German "Hoecus Poecus Imperatus, wer nicht sieht ist blind." The corresponding French term is Passe muscade.

Bohe'mia, any locality frequented by journalists, artists, actors, opera-singers, spouters, and other similar characters.

Bohemian (A), a gipsy, from the French notion that the first gipsies came from Bohemia.

A Literary Bohemian, an author of desultory works and irregular life.

Never was there an editor with less about him of the literary Bohemian — fortnightly Review ("Paston Letters")

Bohemian Literature, desultory reading.

A Bohemian Life, an irregular, wandering, restless way of living, like that of a gipsy.

Bo'hemond, prince of Antioch, a crusader — Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Bois'geln (The young countess de), introduced in the ball given by King Rene at Aix — Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Bois-Guilbert (Sir Brian de), a preceptor of the Knights Templars. Ivanhoe vanquishes him in a tournament. He offers insult to Rebecca, and she threatens to cast herself from the battlements if he touches her. When the castle is set on fire by the sibil, sir Brian carries off Rebecca from the flames. The Grand-Master of the Knights Templars charges Rebecca with sorcery, and she demands a trial by combat. Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert is appointed to sustain the charge against her, and Ivanhoe is her champion. Sir Brian being found dead in the lists, Rebecca is declared innocent — Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

ants of Fortuño His gift was that he could overturn a wind-mill with his breath, and even wreck a man-of-war

Fortuño asked him what he was doing. I am blowing a little, sir," answered he, "to set those mills at work." But "said the knight, you seem too far off." On the contrary," replied the blower, I am too near for it. I did not restrain my breath I should blow the mills over and perhaps the hill too on which they stand. —Comtesse D'Aunoy Fairy Tales (Fortuño 1632)

Bold Beauchamp [Becchi-am], a proverbial phrase similar to "an Achilles," "a Hector," etc. The reference is to Thomas de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, who, with one squire and six archers, overthrew a hundred armed men at Hogges, in Normandy, in 1346

A similar story is told of Le Capitai de Buch, an Englishman who with forty followers cleared Meaux of the insurgents, called La Jaquerie "000 of whom were slain by this little band, or trampled to death in the narrow streets, as they fled panic struck (1358)

Bold Stroke for a Husband, a comedy by Mrs Cowley. There are two plots: one a bold stroke to get the man of one's choice for a husband, and the other a bold stroke to keep a husband. Olivia de Zuniga fixed her heart on Julio de Melesina and refused or disgusted all suitors till he came forward. Donna Victoria, in order to keep a husband, disguised herself in man's apparel, assumed the name of Florio, and made love as a man to her husband's mistress. She contrived by an artifice to get back an estate which don Carlos had made over to his mistress, and thus saved her husband from ruin (1782)

Bold Stroke for a Wife Old Lovely at death left his daughter Anne £30,000, but with this proviso, that she was to forfeit the money if she married without the consent of her guardians. Now, her guardians were four in number, and their characters so widely different that "they never agreed on any one thing." They were sir Philip Modelove, an old beau, Mr Periwinkle, a silly virtuoso, Mr Tradelove, a broker on Change, and Mr Obadiah Prim, a hypocritical quaker. Colonel Feignwell contrived to flatter all the guardians to the top of their bent, and won the heiress —Mrs Centlivre (1717)

Bol'ga the southern parts of Ireland, so called from the Fir-bolg or Belge of Britain who settled there. Bolg means a "quiver," and Fir bolg means "bowmen."

The chiefs of Bolg crowd round the shield of generous Camher —Ossian, Temora II.

Bolster a famous Wrath, who compelled St Agnes to gather up the boulders which infested his territory. She carried three apronfuls to the top of a hill, hence called St Agnes' Beacon (See WRATH'S HOLE)

Bolton (Stawarth), an English officer in The Monastery, a novel by sir W Scott (time, Elizabeth)

Bolton Ass This creature is said to have chewed tobacco and taken snuff —Dr Doran

Bomba (King) a nickname given to Ferdinand II of Naples, in consequence of his cruel bombardment of Messina in 1848. His son, who bombarded Palermo in 1860, is called Bombalino ("Little Bomb")

A young Sicilian too was there (1860) being rebellious to his liege
After Palermo's fatal siege
Across the western sea he fled
In good king Bomb's happy reign
Longfellow The Wayside Inn (prelude)

Bombardinian, general of the forces of king Chrononhotonthologos. He invites the king to his tent, and gives him hashed pork. The king strikes him, and calls him traitor. "Traitor, in thy teeth," replies the general. They fight, and the king is killed —H Carey, Chrononhotonthologos (a burlesque)

Bombastes Furioso, general of Artaxaminous (king of Utopia). He is plighted to Distaffina, but Artaxaminous promises her "half-a-crown" if she will forsake the general for himself. "This bright reward of ever-daring minds" is irresistible. When Bombastes sees himself flouted, he goes mad, and hangs his boots on a tree, with this label duly displayed:

Who dares this pair of boots displace,
Must meet Bombastes face to face.

The king, coming up, cuts down the boots, and Bombastes "kills him." Fusbo, seeing the king fallen, "kills" the general, but at the close of the farce the dead men rise one by one, and join the dance, promising, if the audience likes, "to die again to-morrow" —W B Rhodes, Bombastes Furioso

* * * This farce is a travesty of Orlando Furioso, and "Distaffina" is Angelica, beloved by Orlando, whom she flouted for Meador a young Moor. On this Orlando went mad and hung up his armour on a tree, with this distich attached thereto:

Orlando's arm: let none dislodge,
But each who'll meet him face to face.

In the Rehearsal, by the duke of Buckingham, Bayes' troops are killed, every man of them, by Drawcansir, but revive, and "go off on their legs"

See the translation of Don Quixote, by C. H. Wilmot, Esq., ii 363 (1764)

Bombastes Furioso (The French), captain Fracasse—Théophile Gautier

Bombastus, the family name of Paracelsus. He is said to have kept a small devil prisoner in the pommel of his sword

Bombastus kept a devil's bird
Shut in the pommel of his sword
That taught him all the cunning pranks
Of past and future mountebanks

Buonaventura (Father), a disguise assumed for the nonce by the chevalier Charles Edward, the pretender—Sir W. Scott, Kedgaullet (time, George III.)

Bonduea or Boadicea, wife of Prasutagus king of the Iceni. For the better security of his family, Prasutagus made the emperor of Rome coher with his daughters, whereupon the Roman officers took possession of his palace, gave up the princesses to the licentious brutality of the Roman soldiers, and scourged the queen in public. Bonduea, roused to vengeance, assembled an army, burnt the Roman colonies of London, Colchester [Camalodunum], Verulam, etc., and slew above 80,000 Romans. Subsequently, Suetonius Paulinus defeated the Britons, and Bonduea poisoned herself, v. p. 61. John Fletcher wrote a tragedy entitled Bonduea (1647)

Bone-setter (The), Sarah Mapp (died 1736)

Boney, a familiar contraction of Bon'naparte (3 syl), used by the English in the early part of the nineteenth century by way of depreciation. Thus Thom Moore speaks of "the infidel Boney"

Bonhomme (Jacques), a peasant who interferes with politics, hence the peasants' rebellion of 1358 was called La Jacquerie

The words may be rendered "Jummy" or "Jonny Goodfellow"

Bon'iface (St), an Anglo-Saxon whose name was Winfrid or Winfrith, born in Devonshire. He was made archbishop of Mayence by pope Gregory III., and is called "The Apostle of the Germans." St Boniface was murdered in Friesland by some peasants, and his day is June 5 (680-755)

In Friesland first St. Boniface our best,

At Dookum had his death, by faithless Frisians slain
Dryden Polychronion xlv (1691)

Bon'face (Father), ex-abbot of Kenniquhair. He first appears under the name of Blinkhodie in the character of gardener at Kinross, and afterwards as the old gardener at Dundrennan (Kenniquhair, that is, "I know not where")—Sir W. Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth)

Bon'face (The abbot), successor of the abbot Ingelram, as Superior of St Mary's Convent—Sir W. Scott, The Monastery (time, Elizabeth)

Bon'face, landlord of the inn at Lichfield, in league with the highwaymen. This sleek, jolly publican is fond of the cant phrase, "as the saying is." Thus, "Does your master stay in town, as the saying is?" "So well, as the saying is, I could wish we had more of them." "I'm old Will Boniface, pretty well known upon this road, as the saying is." He had lived at Lichfield "man and boy above eight and fifty years, and not consumed eight and fifty ounces of meat." He says

I have fed purely upon ale. I have eat my ale drank my ale and I always sleep upon my ale"—George Farquhar

Molière L'Avare I 3 (1667)

Bonnet Rouge, a red republican, so called from the red cap of liberty which he wore

Bonnivard (François de), the prisoner of Chillon. In Byron's poem he is one of six brothers, five of whom died violent deaths. The father and two sons died on the battle-field, one was burnt at the stake, three were imprisoned in the dungeon of Chillon, near the lake of Geneva. Two of the three died, and François was set at liberty by Henri the Bearnais. They were incarcerated by the duke-bishop of Savoy for republican principles (1496-1570)

Bonstet'tin (Nicholas), the old deputy of Schwitz, and one of the deputies of the Swiss confederacy to Charles duke of Burgundy — Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstem (time, Edward IV)

Bon'temps (Roger), the personification of that buoyant spirit which is always "inclined to hope rather than fear," and in the very midnight of distress is ready to exclaim, "There's a good time coming, wait a little longer." The character is the creation of Beranger

Vous pauvres pleins d'envie
Vous, riches désireux
Vous, dont le char dévie
Après un cours heureux
Vous qui perdrez peut-être
Des titres é latans
Moi qui j'ai pris pour maître
Le gros Roger Bon'temps

Beranger (1814)

Bon'thron (Anthony), one of Ramorny's followers, employed to murder Smith, the lover of Catherine Glover ("the fair maid of Perth"), but he murdered Oliver instead, by mistake. When charged with the crime, he demanded a trial by combat, and being defeated by Smith, confessed his guilt and was hanged. He was restored to life, but being again apprehended was executed — Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Bon Ton, a farce by Garrick. Its design is to show the evil effects of the introduction of foreign morals and foreign manners. Lord Mink in neglects his wife, and flirts with Miss Tittup. Lady Mink hates her husband, and flirts with colonel Tivy. Miss Tittup is engaged to the colonel. Sir John Trotley, who does not understand bon ton, thinks this sort of flirtation very objectionable. "You'll excuse me, for such old-fashioned notions, I am sure" (1760)

Booby (Lady), a vulgar upstart, who tries to seduce her footman, Joseph Andrews. Parson Adams reproves her for laughing in church. Lady Booby is a caricature of Richardson's "Pamela" — Fielding, Joseph Andrews (1742)

Boone (1 syl), colonel [afterwards "general"] Daniel Boone, in the United States' service, was one of the earliest settlers in Kentucky, where he signalized himself by many daring exploits against the Red Indians (1735-1820)

Only because the gods did else foresee
He should the murderer of his mother be?
Lord Brooke Of Nobility

Booth, husband of Amelia. Said to be a drawing of the author's own character and experiences. He has all the vices of Tom Jones, with an additional share of meanness — Fielding, Amelia (1751)

Borach'io, a follower of don John of Aragon. He is a great villain, engaged to Margaret, the waiting-woman of Hero — Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing (1600)

Borach'io, a drunkard (Spanish, boracho, "drunk," borrachuelo, "a tippler")

Borachio (Joseph), landlord of the Eagle hotel, in Salamanca — Jepson, Zero Strings to you Bow (1792)

Bor'ak (Al), the animal brought by Gabriel to convey Mahomet to the seventh heaven. The word means "lightning." Al Borak had the face of a man, but the cheeks of a horse, its eyes were like jacinths, but brilliant as the stars, it had eagle's wings, glistened all over with radiant light, and it spoke with a human voice. This was one of the ten animals (not of the race of man) received into paradise (See ANIMALS, etc)

Borak was a fine limbed high standing horse strong in frame and with a coat as glossy as marble. His colour was saffron with one hair of gold for every three of the blood — Croquemitaine II 3

Borax, Nosa, or Crapon'dinus, a stone extracted from a toad. It is the antidote of poison — Mirror of Stones

The lord ugly and venomous aid them against king Claudas, "a mighty man of men," who warred against them—Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470)

There are two brethren beyond the sea and they have both the one light king Ban of Benwicke and the other light king Bors of Gaul that is, France—Pt. I. 8.

(Sir Bors was of Gannis, that is, Wales, and was a knight of the Round Table. So also was Borre (natural son of prince Arthur), also called sir Bors sometimes.)

Bors (Sir), called sir Bors de Gannis, brother of sir Lionell and nephew of sir Launcelot. "For all women was he a virgin, save for one, the daughter of king Brandeg'ons, on whom he had a child, light Elaine, save for her, sir Bors was a clean maid" (ch. iv). When he went to Corbin, and saw Galahad the son of sir Launcelot and Elaine (daughter of king Pelles), he prayed that the child might prove as good a knight as his father, and instantly a vision of the holy grail was vouchsafed him, for—

There came a white dove bearing a little censer of gold in her bill and a maiden that bear the Sanguereall and she said: "We go well sir Bors that this child shall achieve the Sanguereall then they kneeled down and there was such a savour as all the spere in the world had been there. And when the dove took her flight, the maiden vanished away with the Sanguereall"—Pt. III. 4.

Sir Bors was with sir Galahad and sir Percival when the consecrated wife assumed the visible and bodily appearance of the Saviour. And this is what is meant by achieving the holy grail, for when they partook of the wife their eyes saw the Saviour enter it—Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, iii 101, 102 (1470).

N.B.—This sir Bors must not be confounded with sir Borre, a natural son of king Arthur and Lyonors (daughter of the earl Sanam, pt. i 15), nor yet with king Bors of Gaul, i.e. France (pt. i 8).

Bortell, the bull, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498).

Bos'can-[Almoga'vâ], a Spanish poet of Barcelona (1500-1543). His poems are generally bound up with those of Garcilasso. They introduced the Italian style into Castilian poetry.

Bossu (René le), French scholar and critic (1631-1680).

And for the epic poem your lordship bade me look at upon taking the length breadth height and depth of it and trying them at home upon an exact scale of Bossu's. Its out, my lord in every one of its dimensions—Sterne (1769).

(I think Sterne means the Abbe Bossut, the mathematician. His critic tried the book on its "length, breadth, and depth," or perhaps he wishes to confound the two authors.)

Bossut (Abbe Charles), a celebrated mathematician (1730-1811).

(Sir Richard Phillips assumed a host of popular names, amongst others that of M. l'Abbe Bossut in several educational works in French.)

Bostanna, one of the two daughters of the old man who entrapped prince Assad in order to offer him in sacrifice on "the fiery mountain." His other daughter was named Cava'ma. The old man enjoined these two daughters to scourge the prince daily with the bastinado and feed him with bread and water till the day of sacrifice arrived. After a time, the heart of Bostanna softened towards her captive, and she released him. Whereupon his brother Amgad, out of gratitude, made her his wife, and became in time king of the city in which he was already vizier—Arabian Nights ("Amgad and Assad").

Bostock, a cockcomb, cracked on the point of aristocracy and family birth. His one and only inquiry is "How many quarterings has a person got?" Descend from the nobility with him covers a multitude of sins, and a man is no one, whatever his personal merit, who "is not a sprig of the nobility"—James Shirley, The Ball (1642).

Bot'any (Father of English), W. Turner, M.D. (1520-1568).

J. P. de Lournefort is called The Father of Botany (1606-1708).

Bottom (Nick), an Athenian weaver, a compound of profound ignorance and unbounded conceit, not without good nature and a fair dash of mother-wit When the play of Pyramus and Thisbe is cast, Bottom covets every part, the lion, Thisbe, Pyramus, all have charms for him In order to punish Titania, the fairy-king made her dote on Master Bottom, on whom Puck had placed an ass's head - Shakespeare Mid Nts Dream

When Goldsmith jealous of the attention which a dancing monkey attracted in a coffee house said "I can do that as well," and was about to attempt it he was but playing Bottom - R. G. White.

Bottomless Pit (The), a ludicrous sobriquet of William Pitt, who was remarkably thin (1759-1806)

Boubekir' Muez'in, of Bagdad, "a vain, proud, and envious iman, who hated the rich because he himself was poor" When prince Zeyn Alasnam came to the city, he told the people to beware of him, for probably he was "some thief who had made himself rich by plunder" The prince's attendant called on him, put into his hand a purse of gold, and requested the honour of his acquaintance Next day, after morning prayers, the iman said to the people, "I find, my brethren, that the stranger who is come to Bagdad is a young prince possessed of a thousand virtues, and worthy the love of all men Let us protect him, and rejoice that he has come among us" - Arabian Nights ("Prince Zeyn Alasnam")

Bouchard (Sir), a knight of Flanders, of most honourable descent He married Constance, daughter of Bertulphe provost of Bruges In 1127 Charles "the Good," earl of Flanders, made a law that a serf was always a serf till manumitted, and whoever married a serf became a serf Now, Bertulphe's father was

Thanemars's serf, and Bertulphe, who had raised himself to wealth and great honour, was reduced to serfdom because his father was not manumitted By the same law Bouchard, although a knight of royal blood, became Thanemars's serf because he married Constance, the daughter of Bertulphe (provost of Bruges) The result of this absurd law was that Bertulphe slew the earl and then himself, Constance went mad and died, Bouchard and Thanemars slew each other in fight, and all Bruges was thrown into confusion. - S Knowles, The Provost of Bruges (1836)

Bought Wit is Dear Wisdom gained by experience is dearly bought - G Gascoigne, Magnum Llectigal, etc (died 1577)

Box and Cox, a dramatic romance, by J. M. Morton, the principal characters of which are Box and Cox

Boy Bachelor (The), William Wotton, D.D., admitted at St Catherine's Hall, Cambridge, before he was ten, and to his degree of B.A. when he was twelve and a half (1666-1726)

Boy Bishop (The), St Nicholas, the patron saint of boys (fourth century)

(There was also an ancient custom of choosing a boy from the cathedral choir on St Nicholas' Day (December 6) as a mock bishop. This boy possessed certain privileges, and if he died during the year was buried in pontificalibus. The custom was abolished by Henry VIII. In Salisbury Cathedral visitors are shown a small sarcophagus, which the verger says was made for a boy bishop)

Boy Crucified. It is said that some time during the dark ages, a boy named Werner was impiously crucified at Bacharach on the Rhine, by the Jews. A little chapel erected to the memory of this boy stands on the walls of the town, close to the river. Hugh of Lincoln and Wilham of Norwich are instances of a similar story

See how its currents gleam and shine
As if the grapes were stained with the blood
Of the innocent boy who, some years back,
Was taken and crucified by the Jews
In that ancient town of Bacharach

Longfellow The Golden Legend

Boys (sea-term) has no reference to age, but only to experience, a boy may be 50 or any other age. A crew is divided into (1) able seamen or scamen, (2) ordinary seamen, (3) boys or green horns. When a person enters himself as a boy, he is not required to know anything about the practical working of the vessel, but able seamen and ordinary seamen must possess a certain amount of experience

There is a sea axiom, A "boy" does not ship to fray anything, that is, when a person accepts the office of "boy" on board ship he does not profess to know anything of his duty, not even the names of the ropes, or the distinction between "um and stern

Boyet, one of the lords attending on the princess of France—Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost (1591)

Boythorn (Laurence), a robust gentleman with the voice of a Stentor, and a friend of Mr Jarndyce. He would utter the most ferocious sentiments, while at the same time he fondled a pet canary on his finger. Once on a time he had been in love with Miss Barbary, Lady Dedlock's sister. But "the good old times—all times when old are good—were gone"—O Dickens, Bleak House (1853)

("Laurence Boythorn" is a photograph of W. S. Lando, as "Herold S' impole, in the same story, is drawn from Leigh Hunt)

Boz, Charles Dickens. It was the nickname of a pet child dubbed Yocky, in honour of "Moses Primrose" in the Life of Walpole. Children called the name Bazes, which got shortened into Boz (1812-1870)

What Dickens Boz could do
I could marry a lady of
I could reward them very
And "Boz" appeared as Dr. L. as a
I am on the contrary in.

Bozzy, James Boswell, the gossip biographer of Dr Johnson (1710-1795)

Brabantio, a senator of Venice, father of Desdemona, most proud, arrogant, and overbearing. He thought the "insouciance" of Othello in marrying his daughter unpardonable, and that Desdemona must have been drugged with love-potions so to demean herself—Shakespeare Othello (1611)

Braccio, commissary of the republic of Florence, employed in picking up every item of scandal he could find against Lucrezia the noble Moor, who commanded the army of Florence against the Pisans. The Florentines hoped to find sufficient cause of blame to lessen or wholly cancel their obligations to the Moor, but even Braccio was obliged to confess "This Moor hath borne his faculties so meek, hath been so clear in his great office, that his virtues would plead like angels, trumpet-tongued," against the council which should censure him—Robert Browning, Luria

Bracidas and Amidas, the two sons of Milesia, the former in love with the wealthy Philtra, and the latter with the dowryless Lucy. Their father at death left each of his sons an island of equal size and value, but the sea daily encroached on that of the elder brother and added to the island of Amidas. The rich Philtra now forsook Bracidas for the richer brother, and Lucy, seeing herself forsaken, jumped into the sea. A floating chest attracted her attention, she clung to it, and was drifted to the wasted island, where Bracidas received her kindly. The chest was found to contain property of great value, and Lucy gave it to Bracidas, together with herself, "the better of them both." Amidas and Philtra claimed the chest as their right, and the dispute was submitted to sir Artegal. Sir Artegal decided that whereas Amidas claimed as his own all the additions which the sea had given to his island, so Lucy might claim as her own the chest which the sea had given into her hands—Spenser, Fairy Queen, v. 1 (1594)

Bracy (de Marne d), a fellower of prince John. He sues the lady Rowena to become his bride, and threatens to kill both Cedric and Ivanhoe if she refuses. The interview is intercepted, and at the close of the novel Rowena marries Ivanhoe—Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.)

Bradamant, daughter of Amon and Beatrice, sister of Rinaldo, and niece of Charlemagne. She was called the Virgin Knight. Her armour was white, and her plume white. She loved Roger to the Moor, but refused to marry him till he was baptized. Her marriage with great pomp and Roger's victory over Isodamont, form the subject of the last book of Orlando Furioso. Bradamant possessed an irresistible spear, which whirled any knight with a touch. Bradamant had a similar spear—Boiardo, Orlando Innamorato (1495), Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Bradwardine (Como Comine), brother of Bradwardine and of Tully

Veolan He is very pedantic, but brave and gallant

Rose Bradwardine, his daughter, the heroine of the novel, which concludes with her marriage with Waverley, and the restoration of the manor-house of Tully Veolan

Malcolm Bradwardine of Inehgrabbit, a relation of the old baron—Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Brady (Martha), a young "Irish widow," 23 years of age, and in love with William Whittle. She was the daughter of sir Patrick O'Neale. Old Thomas Whittle, the uncle, a man of 63, wanted to oust his nephew in her affections, for he thought her "so modest, so mild, so tender-hearted, so reserved, so domestic. Her voice was so sweet, with just a souperon of the brogue to make it enchanting." In order to break off this detestable passion of the old man, the widow assumed the airs and manners of a boisterous, loud, flouting, extravagant, low Irishwoman, deeply in debt, and abandoned to pleasure. Old Whittle, thoroughly frightened, induced his nephew to take the widow off his hands, and gave him £5000 as a douceur for so doing—Garriek, The Irish Widow (1757)

Brag (Jack), a vulgar boaster, who gets into good society, where his vulgarity stands out in strong relief—Theodore Hook, Jack Brag (a novel)

Brag (Sir Jack), general John Burgoyne (died 1792)

Braganza (The), the largest diamond in existence, its weight being 1680 carats. It is uncut, and its value is £58,350,000. It is now among the crown jewels of Portugal

 It is thought that this diamond, which is the size of a hen's egg, is in reality a white topaz

Braganza (Juan duke of) In 1580 Philip II of Spain claimed the crown of Portugal, and governed it by a regent. In 1640 Margaret was regent, and Velasquez her chief minister, a man exceedingly obnoxious to the Portuguese. Don Juan and his wife Louisa of Braganza being very popular, a conspiracy was formed to shake off the Spanish yoke. Velasquez was torn to death by the populace, and don Juan of Braganza was proclaimed king

In the dramas of Braganza Her character is thus described

Bright Ioula

To all the softness of her tender sex,
Unites the noblest qualities of man
A genius to embrace the amplest schemes
Judgment most sound, persuasive eloquence
Pure piety without religious dross,
And fortitude that shrinks at no disaster

Robert Jephson Braganza, I. 1 (1755).

Mrs. Bellamy took her leave of the stage May 24, 1785. On this occasion Mrs. Yates sustained the part of the duchess of Braganza, and Miss Farren spoke the address.—F Reynolds.

Bragela, daughter of Sorgran, and wife of Cathullin (general of the Irish army and regent during the minority of king Cormac)—Ossian, Fingal

Braggado'chio, personification of the intemperance of the tongue. For a time his boasting serves him with some profit, but being found out he is stripped of his borrowed plumes. His shield is eluded by Marinel, his horse by Guyon, Talus shaves off his beard, and his lady is shown to be a sham Florimel—Spenser, Laurie Queen, iii 8 and 10, with v 3

It is thought that Philip of Spain was the academy figure of "Braggadochio"

Braggadochio's Stord, Brang'limore (3 syl)

Bragh [braw] Go bragh (Irish), "for ever"

Brain'worm, the servant of Kno'well, a man of infinite shifts, and a regular Proteus in his metamorphoses. He appears first as Brainworm, after as Fitz-Sword, then as a reformed soldier whom Knowell takes into his service, then as justice Clement's man, and lastly as valet to the courts of law, by which devices he plays upon the same clique of some half-dozen men of average intelligence—Ben Jonson, Every Man in His Humour (1598)

Brakel (Adrian), the gipsy mountebank, formerly master of Fenella, the deaf and dumb girl—Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Bramble (Matthew), an "odd kind of humourist " "always on the fret," dyspeptic, and afflicted with gout, but benevolent, generous, and kind-hearted

Miss Tabitha Bramble, an old maiden sister of Matthew Bramble, of some 45 years of age, noted for her bad spelling. She is starch, vain, prim, and ridiculous, soured in temper, proud, imperious, prying, mean, malicious, and uncharitable. She contrives at last to marry captain Lismaha'go, who is content to take "the maiden" for the sake of her £4000

She is tall raw boned, awkward flat-chested and stooping; her complexion is sallow and freckled; her eyes are not grey but greenish like those of a cat and generally inflamed. Her hair is of a sandy or rather of a dusty hue. Her forehead low. Her nose long sharp and towards the extremity always red in cold weather. Her lips skinny. Her mouth extensive. Her teeth straggling and loose of various colours and conformations and her long neck shrivelled into a thousand wrinkles. — T. Smollett, The Expedition of Humphry Clinker (1771)

* * "Matthew Bramble" is "Roderick Random" grown old, somewhat cynical by experience of the world, but vastly improved in taste

Smollett took some of the incidents of the family tour from Ansley's New Bath Guide. — Chambers, English Literature II

Bramble (Sir Robert), a baronet living at Blackberry Hall, Kent. Blunt and testy, but kind-hearted, "charitable as a Christian, and rich as a Jew," fond of argument and contradiction, but detesting flattery, very proud, but most considerate to his poorer neighbours. In his first interview with lieutenant Worthington "the poor gentleman," the lieutenant mistook him for a bailiff come to arrest him, but Sir Robert nobly paid the bill for £500 when it was presented to him for signature as sheriff of the county.

* * "Sir Robert Bramble" is the same type of character as Sheridan's "Sir Anthony Absolute"

Frederick Bramble, nephew of Sir Robert, and son of Joseph Bramble a Russian merchant. His father having failed in business, Frederick was adopted by his rich uncle. He is full of life and noble instincts, but thoughtless and impulsive. Frederick falls in love with Emily Worthington, whom he marries. — G. Colman, The Poor Gentleman (1802)

Bramine (2 syl) and Bramin (The), Mrs Elizabeth Draper and Laurence Sterne. Sterne being a clergyman, and Mrs Draper being born in India, suggested the names. Ten of Sterne's letters to Mrs Draper are published, and called Letters to Eliza

Brand (Sir Denys), a county magnate, who apes humility. He rides a sorry brown nag "not worth £5," but mounts his groom on a race-horse "twice victor for a plate"

Bran'damond of Damaseus, whom Sir Bevis of Southampton defeated

That dreadful battle where with Brand'mond he fought
And with his sword and steed such earthly wound he wrought

As e'en among his foes his admiration won

M. Drayton, Polyolbion II (1612)

Bran'dan (Island of St) or Island of San Brandon, a flying island, so late as 1755 set down in geographical charts west of the Canary group. In 1721 an expedition was sent by Spain in quest thereof. The Spaniards say their king Rodri'go has retreated there, and the Portuguese affirm that it is the retreat of their don Sebastian. It was called St Brandon from a navigator of the sixth century, who went in search of the "Islands of Paradise"

Its reality was for a long time a matter of firm belief the garden of Armida, where Rinaldo was detained, and which these places in one of the Canary Isles, has been identified with San Brandon. — W. Irving.

(If there is any truth at all in the legend, the island must be ascribed to the Fata Morgana)

Bran'deum, pln Brandeia, a piece of cloth enclosed in a box with relics, which thus acquired the same miraculous powers as the relics themselves

Pope Leo proved this fact beyond a doubt, for when some Greeks ventured to question it, he cut a brandeum through with a pair of scissors and it was instantly covered with blood. — J. Brady, Church Calendar, 18.

Bran'dimart, brother-in-law of Orlando, son of Monocantès, and husband of For'delis. This "king of the Distant Islands" was one of the bravest knights in Charlemagne's army, and was slain by Gradasso. — Bojardo, Orlando Innamorato (1495), Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Sally Brass, Simpson's sister, and an exaggerated edition of her brother — C. Dickens, Old Curiosity Shop (1810)

Bravo (The), Alfonso IV of Portugal (1290-1357)

The Bravest of the Brave, Marshal Ney, Le Brave des Braves (1769-1815)

Brawn One day a little boy came into King Arthur's court, and, drawing his wand over a boar's head, exclaimed, "There's never a cuckold's knife can cut this head of brawn!" and, lo! no knight except Sir Cadoek was able to carve it — Perey, Reliques, III. iii 18

Bray (Mr), a selfish, miserly old man, who dies suddenly of heart-disease, just in time to save his daughter being sacrificed to Arthur Grice, a rich old miser

Madeine Bray, daughter of Mr Bray, a loving, domestic, beautiful girl, who marries Nicholas Nickleby — C. Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Bray (Vicar of), supposed by some to be Simon Alevn, who lived (says Fuller) "in the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, Mary, and Elizabeth. In the first two reigns he was a protestant, in Mary's reign a catholic, and in Elizabeth's a protestant again." No matter who was king, Simon Alevn resolved to live and die "the vicar of Bray" (1510-1588)

Others think the vicar was Simon Symonds, who (according to Ray) was an independent in the protectorate, a high churchman in the reign of Charles II, a papist under James II, and a moderate churchman in the reign of William III

Others again give the cap to one Pendleton

* * The well-known song was written by an officer in Colonel Fuller's regiment, in the reign of George I, and seems to refer to some clergyman of no very distant date

Braymore (Lady Caroline), daughter of Lord Fitz-Ballan. She was to have married Frank Rochdale, but hearing that her "intended" loved Mary Thornberry, she married the Hon. Lord Shuttleton — G. Colman, jun., John Bull (1805)

Braywick, the town of asses. An alderman of Braywick, having lost his donkey, went fourteen days in search of it, then meeting a brother alderman, they agreed to retire to the two opposite sides of a mountain and pray, in hopes that the donkey would answer, and thus reveal its place of concealment. This led to a public scandal, inasmuch that the people of Braywick had to take up arms in order to avenge themselves on those who jeered at them — Cervantes, Don Quixote, II. ii 7 (1615)

Brazen (Captain), a kind of Bobadil. A boastful, tongue-doughty warrior, who pretends to know everybody, to have a liaison with every wealthy, pretty, or distinguished woman, and to have achieved in war the most amazing prodigies

He knows everybody at first sight his impudence were his he ice

Then he sae a Cuckoo among the women I can't rid it that's all. If he has but talked with the mill he swears he has [corrected] the mistress but the most surprising part of his character is his memory which is the most prodigious and the most lasting in the world. — G. Farquhar The Recruiting Officer III. i (1706)

Brazen Age, the age of war and violence. The age of innocence was the golden age, then followed the silver age, then the brazen age, and the present is the iron age, or the age of hardware and railroads

Brazen Head The first on record is one which Silvester II (Gerbert) possessed. It told him he would be pope, and not die till he had sung mass at Jerusalem. When pope he was stricken with his death-sickness while performing mass in a church called Jerusalem (999-1003)

The next we hear of was made by Robt. Grosseteste (1175-1253)

The third was the famous brazen head of Albertus Magnus, which cost him thirty years' labour, and was broken to pieces by his disciple Thomas Aquinas (1193-1280)

The fourth was that of friar Bacon, which used to say, "Time is, time was, time comes." Byron refers to it in the lines

Like friar Bacon's brazen head I've spoken
Time is, thus—was time's jest (?)
Don Juan l. 21* (1819)

Another was made by the marquis of Vilca of Spain (1384-1434) And a sixth by a Polander, a disciple of Escotillo an Italian

Brazen Head (The), a gigantic head kept in the castle of the giant Fer'nagus of Portugal. It was omniscient, and told those who consulted it whatever they desired to know, past, present, or future — Valentine and Orson

Bread Street (London), was the bread-market in the time of Edward I. Here Milton was born

Breaking a Stick is part of the marriage ceremony of the American Indians, as breaking a glass is still part of the marriage ceremony of the Jews — Lady Augusta Hamilton, Marriage Rites, etc., 292, 298

In one of Raphael's pictures we see an unsuccessful suitor of the virgin Mary breaking his stick, and this alludes to the legend that the several suitors of the "virgin" were each to bring an almond stick which was to be laid up in the sanctuary over night, and the owner of the stick which budded was to be accounted the suitor God ordained, and thus Joseph became her husband — B. H. Cowper, Apocryphal Gospel ("Pseudo-Matthew's Gospel," 40, 41)

In Florence is a picture in which the rejected suitors break their sticks on the back of Joseph

Breathes there a man

Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to him—elf hath said
This is my own my native land?
Sir W. Scott Lays of the Last Minstrel vi. 1 (1825)

Brec'an, a mythical king of Wales. He had twenty-four daughters by one wife. These daughters, for their beauty and purity, were changed into rivers, all of which flow into the Severn. Brec'nockshire, according to fable, is called after this king (see next art)

Brec'an was a prince once fortunate and great (Who dying lent his name to that his noble seat)
Whence twice twelve daughters blest, by one and only wife
They for their beauty rare and sanctity of life
To rivers were transformed whose powers then doth declare How excellent they were by being what they are (They) to Fotheringthorpe their course.

M. Drayton, Polyolion iv. (1612)

Brec'hian (Prince), father of St

Cadoek and St Canock, the former a martyr and the latter a confessor

Then Cadoek, next to whom comes Canock both which were Prince Brechan's sons who gave the name to Brecknockshire
The first a martyr made a confessor the other
Drayton Polyolion xlv. (1627)

Breck (Alison), an old fishwife, friend of the Mucklebaelits — Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III)

Brecel (Anghus), a follower of Rob Roy, M'Gregor, the outlaw — Sir W. Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

Bren'da [Finon], daughter of Magnus Troil and sister of Minna — Sir W. Scott, The Pirate (time, William III)

Breng'wain, the confidante of Is'olde (2 syl) wife of sir Mark king of Cornwall. Isolde was criminally attached to her nephew sir Tristram, and Brengwain assisted the queen in her intrigues

Bren'gan, wife of Gwennyn prince of Powys-land — Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Brentano (A), one of inconceivable folly. The Brentanos (Clemens and Bettina) are wild, erratic Germans, in whom no absurdity is inconsistent. Bettina's book, entitled Goethe's Correspondence with a Child, 1835, is a pure fabrication

At the point where the folly of others ceases that of the Brentanos begins — German Proverb

Brentford (The two kings of) In the duke of Buckingham's farce called The Rehearsal (1671), the two kings of Brentford enter hand-in-hand, dance together, sing together, walk arm-in-arm, and to heighten the absurdity the actors represent them as smelling at the same nosegay (act ii. 2)

Bres'an, a small island upon the very point of Cornwall

Upon the utmost end
Of Cornwall's furrowing bank,
Where Breach from the land
The tilting waves doth break
M. Drayton Polyolion i. 1 (1612)

Breton Entée comme le Breton
French proverbial expression

Bretwalda, the over-king of the Saxon rulers, established in England during the heptarchy. In Germany the over-king was called emperor. The bretwalda had no power in the civil affairs of the under-kings, but in times of war or danger formed an important centre (Wald is Anglo-Saxon for ruler.)

Brewer of Ghent (The), James van Artevelde, a great patriot. His son Philip fell in the battle of Rosbecq (fourteenth century)

Briana, the lady of a castle who demanded for toll "the locks of every lady and the beard of every knight that passed." This toll was established because sir Crador, with whom she was in love, refused to marry her till she had provided him with human hair sufficient to "purse a mantle" with. Sir Crador, having been overthrown in knightly combat by sir Calidore, who refused to give "the passage pay," is made to release Briana from the condition imposed on her, and Briana swears to discontinue the discourteous toll.—Spenser, Fairy Queen, vi 1 (1596)

Brianor (Sir), a knight overthrown by the "Salvage Knight," whose name was sir Artegal.—Spenser, Fairy Queen, vi 5 (1596)

Briar'eos (4 syl), usually called Briareus [Bri' a rice], the giant with a hundred hands. Hence Dryden says, "And Briareus, with all his hundred hands" (1694, vi), but Milton writes the name Briar'os (Paradise Lost, i 199)

Then called by thee the monster Titan came Whom Loth's Priareos, men Argos name.

Lopes Stad, i.

Bri'areus (Bo'd), Handel (1685-1757)

Bri'areus of Languages, cardinal Mezzofanti, who was familiar with fifty-eight different languages. Byron calls him "a walking polyglot" (1771-1819)

Bribo'ci, inhabitants of Berkshire and the adjacent counties.—Caesar, Commentaries

Brick (Jefferson), a very well, pale young man, the war correspondent of the New York Bowdler Journal, of which colonel Dyer was editor.—C Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1841)

Bride-Catching. It is a common Asiatic custom for the bridegroom to give chase to the bride, either on foot, horseback, or in canoes. If the bridegroom catches the fugitive, he claims her as his bride, otherwise the match is broken off. The classical tales of Hippomenes and Atalanta will instantly recur to the reader's memory

er she becomes his

In Tarcomanda the maiden carries a lamb and kid which must be taken from her in the chase. In Singa-pore the chase is made in canoes.—Cameron.

Bride of Aby'dos (The), Zuleika (3 syl), daughter of Giasfir (2 syl) pacha of Abydos. She was the troth-plight bride of Selim, but Giasfir shoots the lover, and Zuleika dies of a broken heart.—Byron, Bride of Abydos (1813)

Bride of Lammermoor, Lucy Ashton, in love with Edgar minister of Ravenswood, but compelled to marry Frank Hayston lord of Bucklaw. She tries to murder him on the bridal night, and dies insane the day following.—Sir W Scott, The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III)

 The bride of Lammermoor is one of the most finished of Scott's novels, presenting a unity of plot and action from beginning to end. The old butler, Caleb Balderston, is exaggerated and far too prominent, but he serves as a foil to the tragic scenes

In The Bride of Lammermoor we see embodied the dark spirit of fatalism—that spirit which breathes on the writings of the Greek tragedians when they traced the persecuting vengeance of destiny against the houses of Laius and Orestes. From the time that we hear the prophetic rhymes the spell begins and the clouds blacken round us till they close the tale in a night of horror.—Macaulay

Bride of the Sea, Venice, so called from the ancient ceremony of the doge marrying the city to the Adriatic by throwing a ring into it, pronouncing these words, "We wed thee, O sea, in token of perpetual domination"

Bridewell was a king's palace before the Conquest. Henry I gave the stone for rebuilding it. Its name is from St Bride (or Bridget), and her holy well. The well is now represented by an iron pump in Bride Lane

Bridge. The imaginary bridge between earth and the Mohammedan paradise is called "Al Sirat"

The rainbow bridge which spans heaven and earth in Scandinavian mythology is called "Bifrost"

Bridge of Gold. According to German tradition, Charlemagne's spirit crosses the Rhine on a golden bridge, at Bingen, in seasons of plenty, and blesses both corn-fields and vineyards

Thou standest, like Imperial Charlemagne
Upon thy bridge of gold.

Longfellow Autumn.

Bridge of Sighs, the covered passage-way which connects the palace of the doge in Venice with the State prisons. Called "the Bridge of Sighs" because the condemned passed over it from the judgment hall to the place of execution Hood has a poem called The Bridge of Sighs

Bridges of Cane, in many parts of Spanish America, are thrown over narrow streams

Wild-cane arch high flung o'er gulf profound
Campbell Gertrude of Wyoming II 16 (1802)

Bridgemore (Mr), of Fish Street Hill, London. A dishonest merchant, wealthy, vulgar, and purse-proud. He is invited to a son de given by Lord Abberville, "and counts the servants, gapes at the lustres, and never enters the drawing-room at all, but stays below, chatting with the travelling tutor"

Mrs Bridgemore, wife of Mr Bridgemore, equally vulgar, but with more pretension to gentility

Miss Lucinda Bridgemore, the spiteful, purse-proud, malicious daughter of Mr and Mrs Bridgemore, of Fish Street Hill. She was engaged to Lord Abberville, but her money would not out-balance her vulgarity and ill-temper, so the young "fashionable lover" made his bow and retired—Cumberland, The Fashionable Lover (1780)

Bridgenorth (Major Ralph), a roundhead and conspirator, neighbour of Sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak, a staunch cavalier

Mrs Bridgenorth, the major's wife

Alice Bridgenorth, the major's daughter and heroine of the novel. Her marriage with Julian Peveril, a cavalier, concludes the novel—Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Bridget (Miss), the mother of Tom Jones, in Fielding's novel called The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1750)

It has been wondered why Fielding should have chosen to leave the stain of illegitimacy on the birth of his hero—but had Miss Bridget been privately married there could have been no adequate motive assigned for keeping the birth of the child a secret from a man so reasonable and compassionate as Allworthy—Encyc Brit. Art. Fielding.

Bridget (Mrs), in Sterne's novel called The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gent (1759)

Bridget (Mother), aunt of Catherine Seyton, and abbess of St Catherine—Sir W Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth)

Bridget (May), the milkwoman at Falkland Castle—Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Bridge-ward (Peter), the bridge-keeper of Kennahair ("I know not where")—Sir W Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Bridge-ward (Peter), warder of the bridge near St Mary's Convent. He refuses a passage to father Philip, who is carrying off the Bible of lady Alice—Sir W Scott, The Monastery (time, Elizabeth)

Bridle John Gower says that Rosaphel princess of Armenia, insensible to love, saw in a vision a troop of ladies splendidly mounted, but one of them rode a wretched steed, wretchedly accoutred except as to the bridle. On asking the reason, the princess was informed that she was disgraced thus because of her cruelty to her lovers, but that the splendid bridle had been recently given, because the obdurate girl had for the last month shown symptoms of true love. Moral—Hence let ladies warning take—

Of love that they be not idle
And bid them think of my bridle
Confessio Amantis (Ep. lode of Iosaphete * 1323 1402)

Bridle-goose (Judge), a judge who decided the causes brought before him not by weighing the merits of the case, but by the more simple process of throwing dice—Rabelais, Pantagruel, II 39 (1545)

* * Beaumarchais, in his Marriage of Figaro (1784), has introduced this judge under the name of "Brid'oison." The person satirized by Rabelais is the chancellor Poyet

Bridlesly (Joe), a horse-dealer at Liverpool, of whom Julian Peveril buys a horse—Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Bridoon (Corporal), in Lieutenant Noscbag's regiment—Sir W Scott, Waterley (time, George II)

Brien'nus (Nicephorus), the Cæsar of the Grecian empire, and husband of Anna Comnena (daughter of Alexius Comnennus, emperor of Greece)—Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus) Brigadore (3 syl), Sir Guyon's horse. The word means "Golden bridle"—Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 3 (1596).

Brigantes (3 syl), called by Drayton Brigants, the people of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Westmorland, Cumberland, and Durham

Where in the Britons' rule of yore the Brigants swayed
The powerful English established Northumberland [Northumbria]

Drayton, Polyolbion xvi (1613)

Briggs, one of the ten young gentlemen in the school of Dr Blimber when Paul Dombey was a pupil there Briggs was nicknamed the "Stoney," because his brains were petrified by the constant dropping of wisdom upon them—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846)

Brigliadoro [Bril' ye dor' io], Orlando's steed The word means "Gold bridle"—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Sir Guyon's horse, in Spenser's Faery Queen, is called by the same name (1596)

Brilliant (Sir Philip), a great fop, but brave soldier, like the famous Murit He would dress with all the finery of a vain girl, but would share watching, toil, and peril with the merriest soldier "A butterfly in the drawing-room, but a Hector on the battle-field" He was a "blade of proof, you might laugh at the scabbard, but you wouldn't at the blade" He falls in love with lady Anne, reforms his vanities, and marries—S Knowles, Old Maids (1841)

Brilliant Madman (The), Charles XII of Sweden (1682, 1697-1718)

Brillianta (The lady), a great wit in the ancient romance entitled Tirante le Blanc, author unknown

Here [in Tirante le Blanc] we shall find the famous knight den Kyle Elyson of Montalban his brother Thomas the knight Fonseca the stratagems of the widow Tranquil and the witticisms of lady Brilliant. This is one of the most amusing books ever written—Cervantes Don Quixote I 16 (1600)

Bris (Il conte di San), governor of the Louvre He is father of Valentinna and leader of the St Bartholomew massacre—Meyerbeer, Les Huguenots (1836)

Brisac' (Justice), brother of Miramont

Charles Brisac, a scholar, son of justice Brisac

Lustacc Brisac, a courtier, brother of Charles—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Elder Brother (1637)

Brise'is (3 syl), whose real name was Hippodamia, was the daughter of Brises, brother of the priest Chryses She was the concubine of Achilles, but when Achilles bullied Agamemnon for not giving Chryse'is to her father, who offered a ransom for her, Agamemnon turned upon him and said he would let Chryseis go, but should take Briseis instead—Homer, Iliad, 1

Brisk, a good-natured conceited coxcomb, with a most voluble tongue Fond of saying "good things," and pointing them out with such expressions as "There I had you, eh?" "That was pretty well, egad, eh?" "I hit you in the teeth there, egad!" His ordinary oath was "Let me perish!" He makes love to lady Troth—W Congreve, The Double Dealer (1694)

The marvellous boy who perished in his pride
Wordsworth

Bristol Man's Gift, a present of something which the giver pronounces to be of no use or no value to himself

Britain, according to the British traders, was called first "The green water-fort" (Clas Muddyn), this was before it was populated Its next name was "The honey isle" (Y Vel Ynys) But after it was brought under one head by Prydain son of Aedd, it was called "Prydain's isle" (Ynys Prydain)

It has also been called "Hyperbo'rea," "Atlant'ien," "Cassiteris," "Rom'ina," and "Thulé" Also "Yr Ynys Wen" ("the white island"), and some will have that the word Albion is derived from the Latin, albus, "white," and that the island was so called from "its white cliffs," an etymology only suited to fable

Bochart says Baratanie ("country of tin"), a Phœnician word, contracted into B'atan, is the true derivation

Britan, in Arthurian romance, always means Brittany England is called Logris or Logria

Britan'nia The Romans represented the island of Great Britain by the figure of a woman seated on a rock, from a fanciful resemblance thereto in the general outline of the island The idea is less poetically expressed by "An old watch on a broomstick"

The effigy of Britannia on our copper coin dates from the reign of Charles II (1672), and was engraved by Roettier from a drawing by Evelyn. It is meant for one of the king's court favourites, some say Frances Theresa Stuart, duchess of Richmond, and others Barbara Vilher, duchess of Cleveland

Britannia, the name of the ship under the command of captain Albert, in Falconer's poem called The Shipwreck. It was dashed to pieces on the projecting verge of cape Colonna, the most southern point of Attica (1756)

British History of Geoffrey of Monmouth, is a translation of a Welsh Chronicle. It is in nine books, and contains a "history" of the Britons and Welsh from Brutus, great-grandson of Trojan Aeneas to the death of Cadwallon or Cadwallader in 688. This Geoffrey was first archdeacon of Monmouth, and then bishop of St Asaph. The general outline of the work is the same as that given by Nennius three centuries previously. Geoffrey's Chronicle, published about 1113, formed a basis for many subsequent historical works. A compendium by Diceto is published in Gale's Chronicles.

British Lion (The), the spirit or pugnacity of the British nation, as opposed to John Bull, which symbolizes the substantiality, obstinacy, and solidity of the British nation, with all its prejudices and national peculiarities. To rouse John Bull is to tread on his corns, to rouse the British Lion is to blow the war-trumpet in his ears. The British Lion also means the most popular celebrity of the British nation for the time being.

Our gloious constitution is owing to the habit which the British Lion observes of sitting over his wine after dinner. —William Jerdan.

British Soldiers' Battle (The), the battle of Inkerman, November 5, 1854.

For stubborn valour for true old English resolution to fight it out to the last amid every disadvantage and against almost overwhelming odds men will for ages point to Inkerman the British Soldiers' Battle. —Sir Edward Creasy The Fifteen Decisive Battles (preface).

Britomart, the representative of chastity. She was the daughter and heiress of king Ryence of Wales, and her legend forms the third book of the Faery Queen. One day, looking into Venus's looking-glass, given by Merlin to her father, she saw therein sir Artegal, and fell in love with him. Her nurse Glauce (2 syl.) tried by charms "to undo her love," but "love that is in gentle heart begun no idle charm can remove." Finding her "charms" ineffectual, she took her to Merlin's cave in Carmarthen, and the magician told her she would be the mother of a line of kings (the Tudors), and after twice 100 years one of her off-spring, "a royal virgin," would shake the power of Spain. Glauce now suggested that they should start in quest of sir Artegal, and Britomart donned the armour of Angela (queen of the Angles), which she found in her father's armoury, and taking a magic spear which "nothing could resist," she sallied forth. Her adventures allegorize the triumph of chastity over impurity. Thus in Castle Joyous, Malacosta (lust), not knowing her sex, tried to seduce her, "but she flees youthful lust, which was against the soul." She next overthrew Marinell, son of Cymion. Then made her appearance as the Squire of Dames. Her last achievement was the deliverance of Amoret (wisely love) from the enchanter Busirane. Her marriage is deferred to bk. v. 6, when she tilted with sir Artegal, who "shakes away the ventail of her helmet with his sword," and was about to strike again when he became so amazed at her beauty that he thought she must be a goddess. She bade the knight remove his helmet, at once recognized him, and consented to be his wife. Her marriage is in book v. canto 6 —Spenser, Faery Queen, iii (1590).

She charmed at once and tamed the heart
Incomparable Britomart.

Sir W. Scott.

Briton (Colonel), a Scotch officer, who sees donna Isabella jump from a window in order to escape from a marriage she dislikes. The colonel catches her, and takes her to the house of donna Violante, her friend. Here he calls upon her, but don Felix, the lover of Violante, supposing Violante to be the object of his visits, becomes jealous, till at the end the mystery is cleared up, and a double marriage is the result. —Mrs Centlivre, The Wonder (1711).

Broadside (A). To constitute a broadside, the matter should be printed on the entire sheet, on one side of the paper only, not in columns, but in one measure. It matters not which way of the paper the printing is displayed, or what the size of type, provided the whole is presented to the eye in one view. Although the entire matter of a broadside must be contained on one side of a sheet of paper, an endorsement may be allowed.

Brobd'ingnag, a country of enormous giants, to whom Gulliver was a tiny dwarf. They were as tall "as an ordmay church steeple," and all their surroundings were in proportion

Yon bl. church steeple yon gawky stag
Your husband must come from Broilwuggag
Jane O'Hara Midas.

Block (Adam), in Charles XII, an historical drama by J R Planché

Broken Feather A broken feather in his wing, a scandal connected with one's name, a blot on one's 'scutcheon

If an angel were to walk about Mrs. Sam Hurst would never rest till she had found out where he came from
And perhaps whether he had a broken feather in his wing — Mrs. Oliphant, Phoebe Jun. II, 6

Bromton's Chronicle (time, Edward III), that is, "The Chronicle of John Bromton" printed among the Decem Scriptores, under the titles of "Chronicon Johannis Bromton," and "Jorlanensis Historia a Johanne Bromton," abbot of Jerevaux, in Yorkshire. It commences with the conversion of the Saxons by St. Augustine, and closes with the death of Richard I in 1199. Selden has proved that the chronicle was not written by Bromton, but was merely brought to the abbey while he was abbot.

Bron'tes (2 syl), one of the Cyclops, hence a blacksmith generally. Called Bron'teus (2 syl) by Spenser, Fairy Queen, II, 5 (1596)

Not with such weight to frame the fork y brand
The ponderous hammer falls from Bron'tes' hand
Jerusalem Delivered xx. (Hood's translation)

Bron'zomarte (3 syl), the sorrel steed of sir Launcelot Greaves. The word means a "mettlesome sorrel" — Smollett, Sir Launcelot Greaves (1756)

Brook (Master), the name assumed by Ford when sir John Falstaff makes love to his wife. Sir John, not knowing him, confides to him every item of his amour, and tells him how cleverly he has duped Ford by being carried out in a buck-basket before his very face — Shal'speare, Merry Wives of Windsor (1601)

Brook Street (Grosvenor Square, London), is so called from a brook or stream which at one time ran down that locality

Brooker, the man who stole the son of Ralph Nickleby out of revenge, called him "Smike," and put him to school at Dotheboys Hall, Yorkshire. His tale is told p. 591-5 (original edit) — C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Brother Jon'athan. When Washington was in want of ammunition, he called a council of officers, but no practical suggestion being offered, he said, "We must consult brother Jonathan," meaning his excellency Jonathan Trumbull, the elder governor of the state of Connecticut. This was done, and the difficulty surmounted. "To consult brother Jonathan" then became a set phrase, and "Brother Jonathan" became the "John Bull" of the United States — J R Bartlett, Dictionary of Americanisms

Brother Sam, the brother of lord Dundreary, the hero of a comedy based on a German drama, by John Oxenford, with additions and alterations by E A Sothman and T B Buckstone — Supplied by T B Buckstone, Esq

Brothers (The), a comedy by Richard Cumberland (1769) (For the plot, see BELGRILLD, BROTHERS)

Brougham's Plaid Trousers. The story goes that lord Brougham [Broom] once paid a visit to a great cloth factory in the north, and was so pleased with one of the patters that he requested to be supplied with "a dozen pieces for his own use," meaning, of course, enough for a dozen pair of trousers. The clothier sent him "a dozen pieces," containing several hundred yards, so that his lordship was not only set up for life in plaid for trousers, but had enough to supply a whole clan.

Browdie (John), a brawn, big-made Yorkshire corn-factor, bluff, brusque, honest, and kind-hearted. He befriends poor Smike, and is much attached to lord of the Red Cow Unprincipled, self-willed, ill-tempered, and over-reaching Money is the only thing that moves her, and when she has taken a bribe she will whittle down the service to the finest point —G Colman, jun, John Bull (1805)

Brumo, a place of worship in Craen (one of the Shetland Isles)

Far from his friends they placed him in the horrid circle of Brumo where the ghosts of the dead howl round the stone of their fear —Ossian Fingal vi

Brun'cheval "the Bold," a paynim knight, who tilted with sir Satyrane, and both were thrown to the ground together at the first encounter —Spenser, Fairy Queen, iv 4 (1596)

Brunello, a deformed dwarf, who at the siege of Albracca stole Sicripan'te's charger from between his legs without his knowing it He also stole Angelica's magic ring, by means of which he released Rogero from the castle in which he was imprisoned Ariosto says that Agramant gave the dwarf a ring which had the power of resisting magic —Bojardo, Orlando Innamorato (1490), and Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

"I" says Sancho slept so soundly upon Dapple that the thief had time enough to clap four stakes under the four corners of my pannier and to lead away the beast from under my legs without waking me —Cervantes Don Quixote II l. 4 (1616)

Brunenbug (Battle of), referred to in Tennyson's King Harold, is the victory obtained in 938 by king Athelstan over the Danes

Brunetta, mother of Chery (who married his cousin Furstar) —Comtesse D'Aunoy, Funny Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682)

Brunetta, the rival beauty of Phyllis On one occasion Phyllis procured a most marvellous fabric of gold brocade in order to eclipse her rival, but Brunetta arranged her train-bearer in a dress of the same material and cut in the same fashion Phyllis was so mortified that she went home and died —The Spectator

Brunhild, queen of Issland, who made a vow that none should win her who could not surpass her in three trials of skill and strength (1) hurling a spear, (2) throwing a stone, and (3) jumping Günther king of Burgundy undertook the three contests, and by the aid of Siegfried succeeded in winning the martial queen Iust, hurling a spear that three men could scarcely lift the queen hurled it towards Günther, but Siegfried, in his invisible cloak reversed its direction, causing it to strike the queen and knock her down Next, throwing a stone so huge that twelve brawny men were employed to carry it Brunhild lifted it on high, flung it twelve fathoms, and jumped beyond it Again Siegfried helped his friend to throw it further, and in leaping beyond the stone The queen, being fairly beaten, exclaimed to her liegemen, "I am no longer your queen and mistress, henceforth are ye the liegemen of Günther" (lud vii) After marriage Brunhild was so obstreperous that the king again applied to Siegfried, who succeeded in depriving her of her ring and girdle, after which she became a very submissive wife —The Nibelungen Lied

Bruno (Bishop), bishop of Herbitopolitannum Sailing one day on the Danube with Henry III emperor of Germany, they came to Ben Strudel ("the devouring gulf"), near Grinon Castle, in Austria Here the voice of a spirit clamoured aloud, "Ho! ho! Bishop Bruno, whither art thou travelling? But go thy ways, bishop Bruno, for thou shalt travel with me to-night" At night, while feasting with the emperor, a rafter fell on his head and killed him Southey has a ballad called Bishop Bruno, but it deviates from the original legend given by Herwood in several particulars It makes bishop Bruno hear the voice first on his way to the emperor, who had invited him to dinner, next, at the beginning of dinner, and thirdly, when the guests had well feasted At the last warning an ice-cold hand touched him, and Bruno fell dead in the banquet hall

Brush, the unpertinent English valet of lord Ogleby If his lordship calls he never hears unless he chooses, if his bell rings he never answers it till it suits his pleasure He helps himself freely to all his master's things, and makes love to all the pretty chambermaids he comes into contact with —Colman and Garriek, The Clandestine Marriage (1766)

Brut (Le), a metrical chronicle of Maitre Wace, canon of Caen, in Normandy It contains the earliest history of England, and other historical legends (twelfth century)

Brute (1 syl), the first king of Britain (in mythical history) He was the son of Æneas Silvius (grandson of Ascanius and great-grandson of Æneas of Troy) Brute called London (the capital of his adopted country) Trovnovant (New Troy) The legend is this. An oracle declared that Brute should be the death of both his parents, his mother died in child-birth, and at the age of 15 Brute shot his father accidentally in a deer-hunt. Being driven from Alba Longa, he collected a band of old Trojans and landed at Totness, in Devonshire. His wife was Innogen, daughter of Pandrusus king of Greece. His tale is told at length in the Chronicles of Geoffrey of Monmouth, in the first song of Drayton's Polyolbion, and in Spenser's Fairy Queen, II.

Brute (Sir John), a coarse, surly, ill-mannered brute, whose delight was to "provoke" his young wife, who he tells us "is a young lady, a fine lady, a witty lady, and a virtuous lady, but yet I hate her." In a drunken frolic he intercepts a tailor taking home a new dress to lady Brute, he insists on trying himself therein, is arrested for a street row, and taken before the justice of the peace. Being asked his name, he gives it as "lady John Brute," and is dismissed.

Lady Brute, wife of sir John. She is subjected to divers indignities, and insulted morn, noon, and night, by her surly, drunken husband. Lady Brute intrigues with Constant, a former lover, but her intrigues are more mischievous than vicious—Vanbrugh, The Provoked Wife (1697).

The coarse pot-bellied valour of sir John Brute (Garlick a famous part) is well contrasted with the fine lady airs and affectation of his wife. [Surely this must be an error. It applies to lady Fanciful, not to lady Brute.]—R. Chambers, English Literature I. 238.

Brute Green-Shield, the successor of Ibrance king of Britain. The mythical line is (1) Brute, great-great-grandson of Aeneas, (2) Loerin, his son, (3) Guendolen, the widow of Loerin, (4) Ebrance, (5) Brute Green-Shield. Then follow in order Leil, Hudibras, Bladud, Lear [Shakespeare's "Lear"], etc.

Drayton, Polyolbion VIII (1612)

Brute's City, London, called Trinovant (New Troy)

The goodly Thames near which Brute's city stand.
Drayton, Polyolbion XVI (1613)

(Of course Trinovant is so called from the Trinovantes or Trinobantes, a Celtic tribe settled in Essex and Middlesex when Cæsar invaded the island.)

Bruton Street (London), so called from Bruton, in Somersetshire, the seat of John lord Berkeley of Stratton.

Brutus (Lucius Junius), first consul of Rome, who condemned his own two sons to death for joining a conspiracy to restore Tarquin to the throne, from which he had been banished. This subject has been dramatized by N. Tice (1679) and John H. Payne, under the title of Brutus or The Fall of Tarquin (1820). Alfieri has an Italian tragedy on the same subject. In French we have the tragedies of Arnault (1792) and Ponsard (1813). (See LEON TIA.)

The elder Keen on one occasion consented to appear at the Glasgow Theatre for his son's benefit. The play chosen was Payne's Brutus in which the father took the part of Brutus, and Charles Keen that of Titus. The audience sat sufficed in tears during the pathetic interview. Brutus falls on the neck of Titus exclaiming in a burst of agony, "Embrace thy wretched father!" when the whole house broke forth into peals of approbation. Edmund Keen then will perit in his son's ear. "Charles we are doing the trick."—W. C. I. Weekly Paper Tentative Actors 4.6.

James Brutus. So James Lynch Fitz-Stephen has been called, because (like the first consul of Rome) he condemned his own son to death for murder, and to prevent a rescene caused him to be executed from the window of his own house in Galway (1893).

The Spanish Brutus, Alfonso Perer de Guzman, governor of Tarifa in 1293. Here he was besieged by the infant don Juan, who had revolted against his brother, king Sancho IV, and having Guzman's son in his power, threatened to kill him unless Tarifa was given up to him. Guzman replied, "Sooner than be guilty of such treason I will lend Juan a dagger to slay my son," and so saying tossed his dagger over the wall. Sad to say, Juan took the dagger, and assassinated the young man there and then (1258-1309).

Brutus (Marcus), said to be the son of Julius Cæsar by Servilia.

Brutus his land hand
Stabbed Julius Cæsar
Shakespeare 2 Henry 11 act 1 sc. 1 (1611).

This Brutus is introduced by Shakespeare in his tragedy of Julius Cæsar, and the poet endows him with every quality of a true patriot. He loved Cæsar much, but he loved Rome more.

John P. Kemble seems to me always to play the best those characters in which it was a predominate thing of some over-mastering passion. The patrician pride of Coriolanus, the stoicism of Brutus, the vehemence of Hotspur mark the class of characters I mean.—Mr W. Scott.

are told that Edmund Keen Brutus never approached the distance of the learned and majestic Kemble.

Brutus Et tu, Brute Shakespeare, on the authority of Suetonius, puts these words into the mouth of Cæsar when Brutus stabbed him Shakespeare's drama was written in 1607, and probably he had seen The True Tragedy of Richard duke of York (1600), where these words occur, but even before that date H Stephens had said

Jufte Cæsar quand il vit que Brutus aussi estoit de ceux qui lui tiroient des coups d'espee, luy dit, Katay tecton! c'est à dire Et toy mon fils en es tu aussi.—Deux Dial du nouveau Lang France (1553)

Brutus and Cicero Cicero says "Cæsar interfecit, statim, cruentum alte extollens M Brutus pugionem Ciceronem nominatum exclamavit, atque ei recuperatam libertatem est gratulatus"—Phil pp 11 12

Buckingham (George Villiers duke of) son of the preceding, and favourite of Charles II He made the "whole body of vice his study," and his name furnishes the third letter of the famous anagram "CANAL" This was the duke who wrote The Rehearsal (q v) He is introduced by Sir W Scott in Peveril of the Peak, and by Dryden in Absalom and Achitophel, where he is called "Zimri" He died wretchedly in the house of one of his tenants in Yorkshire (1627-1688)

In the worst Inn's worst room with mat half hang,
The floor of plaster and the walls of dung,
On once a flock bed but repaired with straw
With tape tied curtains never meant to draw
Great Villiers lies—alas how changed from him—
That life of pleasure, and that soul of whim
Pope Moral Essays III

Bucklers-bury (London), so called from one Buckle, a grocer (Old and New London) In the reign of Elizabeth and long afterwards Bucklersbury was chiefly inhabited by druggists, who sold green and dried herbs Hence Falstaff says to Mrs Ford, he could not assume the ways of those "hisping hawthorn buds [i.e. young fops], who smell like Bucklers-bury in simple-time" — Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, act iii sc 3 (1601)

Bude Light, a light devised by Mr Gurney of Bude, in Cornwall Intense light is obtained by supplying the burner with an abundant stream of oxygen The principle of the Argand lamp is also a free supply of oxygen Gurney's invention is too expensive to be of general service, but an intense light is obtained by reflectors and refractors called Bude lights, although they wholly differ in principle from Gurney's invention

Buffoon (The Pulpit) Hugh Peters is so called by Dugdale (1599-1660)

Bug Jargal, a negro, passionately in love with a white woman, but tempering the wildest passion with the deepest respect — Victor Hugo, Bug Jargal (a novel)

Bulbul, a nightingale, any singer of ditties When, in The Princess (by Tennyson), the prince, disguised as a woman, enters with his two friends (similarly disguised) into the college to which no man was admitted, he sings, and the princess, suspecting the fraud, says to him, "Not for thee, O bulbul, any rose of Gulistan shall burst her veil," i.e. "O singer, do not suppose that any woman will be taken in by such a flimsy deceit" The bulbul loved the rose, and Gulistan means the "garden of roses" The prince was the bulbul, the college was Gulistan, and the princess the rose sought. — Tennyson, The Princess, iv

Bulbul-He'zar, the talling bird, which was joined in singing by all the song-birds in the neighbourhood (See TALKING BIRD) — Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last story)

Bulls, mother of Egyptians of Thesaly

Egyptus entertained a criminal love for Timandra, the mother of Neoph'ron, and Neophron was guilty of a similar passion for Bais Jupiter changed Egyptus and Neophron into vultures, Bulls into a duck, and Timandra into a sparrow-hawk — Classic Mythology

Bull (John), the English nation personified, and hence any typical Englishman

Bull in the main was an honest plain-dealing fellow choleric, bold, and of a very inconstant temper He dreaded not old Lewis (Louis XIV) either at lock-sword single-fashions or edged play but then he was very apt to quarrel with his best friends especially if they pretended to govern him If you said and then you might lead him as a child John's temper depended very much upon the air, his spirits rose and fell with the weather place He was quick and ready in looking into his accounts, nor more clever by partners apprentices and servants No man kept a better house, he spent his money more generously — Clap 2

(The subject of this History is the "Spanish Succession" in the reigns of Louis XIV and queen Anne)

Mrs Bull, queen Anne, "very apt to be choleric" On hearing that Philip Baboon (Philippe duc d'Anjou) was to succeed to lord Strutt's estates (i.e. the Spanish throne), she said to John Bull

You say you better show such houses and taverns spend your time at ballards, singings, or puppet shows never minding me nor my numerous family Don't you think I shall be a King of Spain? Was he soke? He livers at Lewis Baboon's shop (Spain)! He upon it? Oh dear! I'll sell my shirt for to fill his used." — Clap 4

John Bull's Mother, the Church of England

John had a mother whom I loved and honoured extremely a discreet grave sober good-counselled elderly old gentlewoman as ever lived She was none of your embroidered mantua and diamond jewels always censuring your conduct on the contrary she was of a mean spirit and put the best construction on in the words and actions of her neighbours She clothed in a ruff forehead cloth nor high crowned hat She seemed to patch and patch yet she lived cleanline

She was no less good hearted and kind in the due mean between one of your strict and cutting pieces of civility and your ill-mannered areas which have regard to the common rules of civility — Pu. II. 1

John Bull's Sister Peg, the Scotch, in love with Jack (Catani)

John had a sister a poor girl that had been reared on oatmeal and water and led in a parcel exposed to the north wind However this age I fear a hardy constitution I shall indeed some old livers and a cold antipathy she would fall at the sound of an organ and yet dance and did at the note of a harp — Dr Arbuthnot History of John Bull, II 2 (1715)

Bulls, ludicrous blunders

Merry tales, witty jests and ridiculous bulls. — Language of Manners (1783)

That such a poem should be toothless and affirm to be a bull — Milton Apology for Drayton's Bulls (1634)

Bull-dog, rough iron

A man was putting some bull dog into the rolls when his spade caught between the rolls — Times

Bum'ble, beadle of the workhouse where Oliver Twist was born and brought up. A stont, consequential, hard-hearted, fussy official, with mighty ideas of his own importance. This character has given to the language the word bumbledom, the officious arrogance and bumptious conceit of a parish authority or petty dignitary. After marriage, the high and mighty beadle was sadly hen-pecked and reduced to a Jerry Sneak—C Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Bumbledom, parish-dom, the pride of parish dignity, the arrogance of parish authority, the ugliness of parish officers. From Bumble, the beadle, in Dickens's Oliver Twist (1837)

Bum'kinet, a shepherd. He proposes to Grubbinol that they should repair to a certain hut and sing "Gillian of Croydon," "Patient Grissel," "Cast away Care," "Over the Hills," and so on, but being told that Blouzelinda was dead, he sings a dirge, and Grubbinol joins him

Thus wailed the louts in melancholy strain
Till bonny Susan sped across the plain
They seized the lass in apron clean arrayed
And to the ale house forced the willing maid
In ale and kisses they forgot their cares
And Susan Blouzelinda's loss repaired.
Gry. Pastoral v (1714)

(An imitation of Virgil's Ecl v "Daphnis")

Bun'cle, messenger to the earl of Douglas—Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Bun'cle (John), "a prodigious hand at matrimony, divinity, a song, and a peck." He married seven wives, and lost all in the flower of their age. For two or three days after the death of a wife he was inconsolable, but soon became resigned to his loss, which he repaired by marrying again—Thos Amory, The Life, etc, of John Buncle, Esq

Bundalinda, the beau-ideal of obscurity

Transferred from a princess to a peasant, from beauty to ugliness, from polish to rusticity, from light to darkness, from an angel of light to an imp of hell, from fragrance to ill savour, from elegance to rudeness, from Aurora in full brilliancy to Bundalinda in deep obscurity—Cerrantes, Don Quixote II li 13 (1616).

Bundle, the gardener, father of Wilhelmina, and friend of Tom Tug the waterman. He is a plain, honest man, but greatly in awe of his wife, who nags at him from morning till night.

Mrs Bundle, a vulgar Mrs Malaprop, and a termagant. "Everything must be her way or there's no getting any peace." She greatly frequented the minor theatres, and acquired notions of sentimental romance. She told Wilhelmina, if she refused to marry Robin

"I'll disherit you from any share in the blood of my family the Groggin and you may creep through life with the dirty pitiful mean pultry low ill bred notions which you have gathered from [your father's] family the Bundles"—C Dibdin The Waterman (1774)

Bun'gay (Friar), one of the friars in a comedy by Robert Green, entitled Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay. Both the friars are conjurers, and the piece concludes with one of their pupils being carried off to the infernal regions on the back of one of friar Bacon's demons (1591)

Bungen [Bung'-n], the street in Hameln down which the pied piper Bunting led the rats into the river Weser and the children into a cave in the mountain Koppenberg. No music of any kind is permitted to be played in this street.

Bungey (Friar), personification of the charlatan of science in the fifteenth century.

* * In The Last of the Barons, by Lord Lytton, friar Bungey is an historical character, and is said to have "raised mists and vapours," which befriended Edward IV at the battle of Barnet.

Bunsby (Captain John or Jack), owner of the Cautious Clara. Captain Cattle considered him "a philosopher, and quite an oracle." Captain Bunsby had one "stationary and one revolving eye," a very red face, and was extremely fractious. The captain was entrapped by Mrs McStinger (the termagant landlady of his friend captain Cattle) into marrying her.—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846)

Bunting, the pied piper of Ham'eln. He was so called from his dress.

To blow the pipe his lips he wrinkled
And green and blue his sharp eyes twinkled
And ere three notes his pipe had uttered
Out of the houses rats came tumbling—
Great rats, small rats, lean rats, brawny rats,
Brown rats, black rats, grey rats, tawny rats,
And step by step they followed him dancing
Till they came to the river Weser

R. Browning.

Bur (Jo'n), the servant of Job Thornberry, the brazier of Penzance. Brusque in his manners, but most devotedly attached to his master, by whom he was taken from the workhouse. John Bur kept his master's "books" for twenty-two years with the utmost fidelity.—G Colman, jun., John Bull (1805)

Bur'bon (i.e. Henri IV of France). He is betrothed to Fordclis (France), who has been enticed from him by Grattorto (rebellion). Being assailed on all sides by a rabble ront, Fordclis is carried off by "hellmake hounds." The rabble batter Bourbon's shield (protestantism), and compel him to throw it away. Sir Artegal (right or justice) rescues the "recrcent knight" from the mob, but blames him for his unknighly folly in throwing away his shield (of faith). Talus (the executive) beats off the hell-hounds, gets possession of the lady, and though she flouts Bourbon, he catches her up upon his steed and rides off with her.—Spenser, Faery Queen, v. 11 (1596)

Burchell (Mr), alias sir William Thornhill, about 30 years of age. When Dr Primrose, the vicar of Wakefield, loses £1400, Mr Burchell presents himself as a broken-down gentleman, and the doctor offers him his purse. He turned his back on the two flash ladies who talked of their high-life doings, and cried "Fudge!" after all their boastings and remarks. Mr Burchell twice rescued Sophia Primrose, and ultimately married her.—Goldsmith, Vicar of Wakefield (1765)

Burgundy (Charles the Bold, duke of), introduced by sir W Scott in Quentin Durward and in Anne of Geierstein. The latter novel contains the duke's defeat at Nancy, and his death (time, Edward IV)

Bur'idan's Ass. A man of indecision is so called from the hypothetical ass of Buridan, the scholastic. Buridan maintained that "if an ass could be placed between two hay-stacks in such a way that its choice was evenly balanced between them, it would starve to death, for there would be no motive why he should choose the one and reject the other."

Burleigh (William Cecil, lord), lord treasurer to queen Elizabeth (1520-1598), introduced by sir W Scott in his historical novel called Kennilworth (time, Elizabeth)

He is one of the principal characters

Byron's song is Miss Chaworth Both Miss Chaworth and lord Byron were wards of Mr White Miss Chaworth married John Musters, and lord Byron married Miss Milbanke of Durham, both equally unhappy

Cælesti'na, the bride of sir Walter Terill. The king commanded sir Walter to bring his bride to court on the night of her marriage. Her father, to save her honour, gave her a mixture supposed to be poison, but in reality it was only a sleeping draught. In due time the bride recovered, to the amusement of the king and delight of her husband — Th. Dekker, Sahro-mastic (1602)

Cæ'neus [See nuce] was born of the female sex, and was originally called Cenis. Vain of her beauty, she rejected all lovers, but was one day surprised by Neptune, who offered her violence, changed her sex, converted her name to Ceneus, and gave her (or rather him) the gift of being invulnerable. In the wars of the Lapithæ, Ceneus offended Jupiter, and was overwhelmed under a pile of wood, but came forth converted into a yellow bird. Æneas found Ceneus in the infernal regions restored to the feminine sex. The order is inverted by sir John Davies

And how was Ceneus made at first a man
And then a woman, then a man again

Cæsar, said to be a Punic word meaning "an elephant," "Quid avus ejus in Africa manu propria occidit elephantem" (Plin Hist viii 7). There are old coins stamped on the one side with DIVUS JULIUS, the reverse having SPQR with an elephant, in allusion to the African original

In Targum Jonathan's Cæsar extat, nollone affine pro acuto vel clypeo et fortasse inde est quod Punicæ lingua elephas "Cæsar" dicebatur quasi intamen et præsidium legionum. — Casaubon Animadv. in Tranjull i

Cæsar (Caus Julius)

Somewhere I've read but where I forget, he could die late Seven letters at once at the same time writing his memoirs
Better be first, he said, in a little Iberian village
Than be second in Rome, and I think he was right who is he said it.

Twice was he married before he was 20 and many times after Battles 300 he fought and a thousand cities he conquered,
But was finally stabbed by his friend the orator Brutus
Longfellow Courtship of Miles Standish II

(Longfellow refers to Pliny, vii 25, where he says that Cæsar "could employ, at one and the same time, his ears to listen, his eyes to read, his hand to write, and his tongue to dictate" He is said to have conquered 300 nations, to have taken 800 cities, to have slain in battle 1 million men, and to have defeated three millions. See below, Cæsar's Wars)

Cæsar and his Fortune Plutarch says that Cæsar told the captain of the vessel in which he sailed that no harm could come to his ship, for that he had "Cæsar and his fortune with him"

Now am I like that proud insulting ship
Which Cæsar and his fortune bore all once
Shakespeare 1 Henry VI act I, sc. 2 (1599)

Cæsar writes his Commentaries Once when Julius Cæsar was in danger of being upset into the sea by the overloading of a boat, he swam to the nearest ship, with his book of Commentaries in his hand — Suetonius Cæsar's Wars The carnage occasioned by the wars of Cæsar is usually estimated at a million fighting men. He won 320 triumphs, and fought 500 battles. See above, CIVIL (Caus Julius)

What millions died that Cæsar might be great!
Campbell The Picturers of Hope II. (1799)

Cæsar's Famous Despatch, "Veni, vidi, vici," written to the senate to announce his overthrow of Pharnacæ's king of Pontus. This "hop, skip, and a jump" was, however, the work of three days

Cæsar's Death Both Chaucer and Shakespeare say that Julius Cæsar was killed in the capitol. Thus Polonius says to Hamlet, "I did enact Julius Cæsar, I was killed in the capitol" (Hamlet, act iii sc 2). And Chaucer says

This Julius to the capitol wente
And in the capitol won him hento
This false Brutus and his other noon
And stiked him with bookekins anon
Canterbury Tales (The Monk's Tale "1383)

Plutarch expressly tells us he was killed in Pompey's Porch or Piazza, and in Julius Cæsar Shakespeare says he fell "even at the base of Pompey's statue" (act iii sc 2)

Cæsar, the Mephistoph'els of Byron's unfinished drama called The Deformed Transformed. This Cæsar changes Arnold (the hunchback) into the form of Achilles, and assumes himself the deformity and ugliness which Arnold casts off The drama being incomplete, all that can be said is that "Cæsar," in cynicism, effrontery, and snarling bitterness of spirit, is the exact counterpart of his prototype, Mephistopheles (1821)

Cain and Abel are called in the Korân "Kâbil and Hâbil" The tradition is that Cain was commanded to marry Abel's sister, and Abel to marry Cain's, but Cain demurred because his own sister was the more beautiful, and so the matter was referred to God, and God answered "No" by rejecting Cain's sacrifice.

The Mohammedans also say that Cain carried about with him the dead body of Abel, till he saw a raven scratch a hole in the ground to bury a dead bird The hunt was taken, and Abel was buried under ground — Sale's Korân, v notes

Cair'bar, son of Borbar-Duthml, "lord of Atha" (Conraught), the most potent of the race of the Fir-bolg. He rose in rebellion against Cormac "king of Ireland," murdered him (Temora, 1), and usurped the throne, but Fingal (who was distinctly related to Cormac) went to Ireland with an army, to restore the ancient dynasty. Cairbar invited Oscar (Fingal's grandson) to a feast, and Oscar accepted the invitation, but Cairbar having provoked a quarrel with his guest, the two fought, and both were slain

'Thy heart is a rock. Thy thougts are dark and I oodly Thou art the brother of Cairbar but my soul is not like thine, thou feel'st hand in fight. The ill of my bosom is stained by thy deeds.—Ossian Temora 1

Cair'bre (2 syl), sometimes called "Cair'bar," third king of Ireland, of the Caledonian line. (There was also a Cairbar, "lord of Atha," a Fir-bolg, quite a different person.)

The Caledonian line ran thus (1) Conar, first "king of Ireland," (2) Cormac I, his son, (3) Cairbre, his son, (4) Artho, his son, (5) Cormac II, his son, (6) Ferad-Artho, his cousin—Ossian

Calandri'no, a character in the Decameron, whose "misfortunes have made all Europe merry for four centuries"—Boccaccio, Decameron, viii 9 (1350)

Calan'tha, princess of Sparta, loved by Ithoel's. Ithoel's induces his sister, Penthe'a, to break the matter to the princess. This she does, the princess is won to requite his love, and the king consents to the union. During a grand court ceremony Calantha is informed of the sudden death of her father, another announces to her that Penthe'a had starved herself to death from hatred to Bassan's, and a third follows to tell her that Ithoel's, her betrothed husband, has been murdered. Calantha bakes no jot of the ceremony, but continues the dance even to the bitter end. The coronation ensues, but scarcely is the ceremony over than she can support the strain no longer, and, broken-hearted, she falls dead.—John Ford, The Broken Heart (1635)

Calan'the (3 syl), the betrothed wife of Pythias the Syracusan.—J Banim, Damon and Pythias (1825)

Cala'ya, the third paradise of the Hindus

Cal'culator (The). Alfragan the Arabian astronomer was so called (died A.D. 820). Jedediah Buxton, of Elmton, in Derbyshire, was also called "The Calculator" (1705-1775). George Bidder, Zerah Colburn, and a girl named Hewwood (whose father was a mill and weaver), all exhibited their calculating powers in public.

Pascal, in 1642, made a calculating machine, which was improved by Leibnitz. C Babbage also invented a calculating machine (1790-1871).

Calcut'ta is Kah-cuttah ("temple of the goddess Kali")

Cal'deron (Don Pedro), a Spanish poet born at Madrid (1600-1681). At the age of 52 he became an ecclesiastic, and composed religious poetry only. Altogether he wrote about 1000 dramatic pieces.

Ca'ledonia's, Gauls from France who colonized south Britain, whence they journeyed to Inverness and Ross. The word is compounded of two Celtic words, Ca'el ("Gaul" or "Celt"), and don or dun ("a hill"), so that Ca'el-don means "Celts of the highlands"

Ca'lenders, a class of Mohammedans who abandoned father and mother, wife and children, relations and possessions, to wander through the world as religious devotees, living on the bounty of those whom they made their dupes.—D'Herbelot, Supplement, 204

He diverted himself with the multitude of calenders, santons and dervies, who had travelled from the heart of India and halted on their way with the emir.—W. Beckford Father (1786)

The Three Calenders, three royal princes, disguised as begging dervishes, each of whom had lost his right eye. Their adventures form three tales in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments

Tale of the First Calender. No names are given. This calender was the son of a king, and nephew of another king. While on a visit to his uncle his father died, and the vizier usurped the throne. When the prince returned, he was seized, and the usurper pulled out his right eye

The uncle died, and the usurping vizier made himself master of this kingdom also. So the hapless young prince assumed the garb of a calender, wandered to Bagdad, and being received into the house of "the three sisters," told his tale in the hearing of the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid.—The Arabian Nights

Tale of the Second Calender. No names given. This calender, like the first, was the son of a king. On his way to India he was attacked by robbers, and though he contrived to escape, he lost all his effects. In his flight he came to a large city, where he encountered a tailor, who gave him food and lodging. In order to earn a living, he turned woodman for the nonce, and accidentally discovered an under-ground palace, in which lived a beautiful lady, confined there by an evil genius. With a view of liberating her, he kicked down the talisman, when the genius appeared, killed the lady, and turned the prince into an ape. As an ape he was taken on board ship, and transported to a large commercial city, where his penmanship recommended him to the sultan, who made him his vizier. The sultan's daughter undertook to disenchant him and restore him to his proper form, but to accomplish this she had to fight with the malignant genius. She succeeded in killing the genius, and restoring the enchanted prince, but received such severe injuries in the struggle that she died, and a spark of fire which flew into the right eye of the prince perished it. The sultan was so heart-broken at the death of his only child, that he insisted on the prince quitting the kingdom without delay. So he assumed the garb of a calender, and being received into the hospitable house of "the three sisters," told his tale in the hearing of the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid.—The Arabian Nights

Tale of the Third Calender. This tale is given on p. 12, under the word AGIL.

I am called Agil, he says, and am the son of a king whose name was Cassib.—Arabian Nights 12.

Calcpine (Sir), the knight attached to Sere'na (canto 3). Seeing a bear carrying off a child, he attacked it, and squeezed it to death, then committed the babe to the care of Matilde, wife of sir Bruin. As Matilde had no child of her own, she adopted it (canto 4).—Spenser, Fairy Queen, vi (1596)

* * Upton says, "the child" in this incident is meant for M'Mahon, of Ireland, and that "Mac Mahon" means the "son of a bear." He furthermore says that the McMahons were descended from the Litz-Ursulas, a noble English family

And hang a calf-skin on those recreant limbs
Shakespeare, King John act III sc 1 (1-36)

Calibanax, a humorous old lord, father of Aspatia the troth-plight wife of Anun'tor. It is the death of Aspatia which gives name to the drama—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Maid's Tragedy (1610)

Caliban, a savage, deformed slave of Prospero (the rightful duke of Milan and father of Miranda). Caliban is the "freckled whelp" of the witch Sycorax. Mrs Shelley's "Frankenstein" is a sort of Caliban—Shakespeare, The Tempest (1609)

Caliban—Is all earth he has the dawning of understanding without reason or the moral sense this advance to the intellectual faculties without the moral sense is marked by the appearance of the Caliban.

Cal'iburn, same as Excalibur, the famous sword of king Arthur

Onward Arthur paced, with hand
On Caliburn's readiness brand.
Sir W. Scott Bridal of Trarman (1813)

Arthur drew out his Caliburn and rushed forward with great fury into the thickest of the enemy's ranks nor did he give over the fury of his assault till he had with his Caliburn killed 40 men—Geoffrey Chaucer The story of Sir Lancelot (1112)

Cal'idore (Sir), the type of courtesy, and the hero of the sixth book of Spenser's Fairy Queen. The model of this character was sir Philip Sydney. Sir Cal'idore (3 syl) starts in quest of the Blatant Beast, which had escaped from sir Artegal (bl 12). He first compels the lady Brianna to discontinue her discourteous toll of "the locks of ladies and the beards of knights" (canto 1). Sir Cal'idore falls in love with Pastorella, a shepherdess, dresses like a shepherd, and assists his lady-love in keeping sheep. Pastorella being taken captive by brigands, sir Cal'idore rescues her, and leaves her at Belgard Castle to be taken care of, while he goes in quest of the Blatant Beast. He finds the monster after a time, by the havoc it had made with religious houses, and after an obstinate fight succeeds in muzzling it and dragging it in chains after him, but it got loose again, as it did before (canto 12)—Spenser, Fairy Queen, vi (1596)

Sir Gawain was the Cal'idore of the Round Table—Southey

* * "Pastorella" is Frances Walsingham (daughter of sir Francis), whom sir Philip Sydney married. After the death of sir Philip she married the earl of Essex. The "Blatant Beast" is what we now call "Mrs Grundy."

Calig'orant, an Egyptian giant and crumbal, who used to entrap travellers with an invisible net. It was the very same net that Vulcan made to catch Mars and Venus with. Mercury stole it for the purpose of entrapping Chloris, and left it in the temple of Anu'bis, whence it was stolen by Calig'orant. One day Astolpho, by a blast of his magic horn, so frightened the giant that he got entangled in his own net, and being made captive was despoiled of it—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1616).

Cal'no, a famous French utterer of bulls

Caliph means "vicar" or representative of Mahomet. Scaliger says, "Caliph est vicarius" (Isagog, 3). The dignity of sultan is superior to that of caliph, although many sultans called themselves caliph. That passage which in our version of the New Testament is rendered "Archelus reigned in his stead" (i.e. in the place of Herod), is translated in the Syriac version Chalaph Herodes, that is, "Archelaus was Herod's caliph" or vicar. Similarly, the pope calls himself "St Peter's vicar"—Selden, Titles of Honour, v 68-9 (1672)

Calip'olis, in The Battle of Alcazar, a drama by George Peele (1582). Pistol says to Mistress Quickly

Then feed an ill fat my fair Calipolis—Shakespeare
Henry IV act II sc 4 (1-25)

Cal'is (The princess), sister of As'torax king of Paphos, in love with Polydore, brother of general Memnon, but loved greatly by Siphax—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Mad Lover (1617)

Calis'ta, the fierce and haughty daughter of Sciol'to (3 syl), a proud Genoese nobleman. She yielded to the seduction of Loth'rio, but engaged to marry Altamont, a young lord who loved her dearly. On the wedding day a letter was pieced up which proved her guilt, and she was subsequently seen by Altamont conversing with Lothario. A duel ensued, in which Lothario fell, in a street row Sciolto received his death-wound, and Calista stabbed herself. The character of "Calista" was one of the parts of Mrs Siddons, and also of Miss Branton — N Rowe, The Fan Penitent (1703)

Richardson has given a purity and sanctity to the sorrows of his Clarissa which leave Calista immeasurably behind. — R. Chambers English Literature I. 590

Twelve years after Norris's death, Mrs. Barry was acting the character of Calista. In the last act where Calista Calisto and Ar'cas Calisto, an Arcadian nymph, was changed into a she-bear. Her son Arcas, supposing the bear to be an ordinary beast, was about to shoot it, when Jupiter metamorphosed him into a he-bear. Both were taken to heaven by Jupiter, and became the constellations Ursa Minor and Ursa Major.

Call'aghan O'Brall'aghan (Sir), "a wild Irish soldier in the Prussian army. His military humour makes one fancy he was not only born in a siege, but that Bellona had been his nurse, Mars his schoolmaster, and the Furies his play-fellows" (act 1). He is the successful suitor of Charlotte Goodchild — C Macklin, Love a-la-mode (1779)

In the records of the stage no actor ever approached Jack Johnson in Irish characters. — Sir Lucius O'Trigger. Callaghan O'Brallaghan, major O'Flaherty, "Teague" Tully (the Irish gardener) and Dennis Brulgruddery were portrayed by him in most exquisite colours. — New Monthly Magazine (1829).

Callir'hoe (1 syl), the lady-love of Chareas, in a Greek romance entitled The Loves of Chareas and Callirrhoe, by Chariton (eighth century), Callis'thenes (1 syl), a philosopher who accompanied Alexander the Great on his Oriental expedition. He refused to pay Alexander divine honours, for which he was accused of treason, and being mutilated, was chained in a cage for seven months like a wild beast. La Si-machus put an end to his tortures by poison (1678).

Cal'mar son of Matba, lord of Lara (in Connaught). He is represented as presumptuous, rash, and overbearing, but gallant and generous. The very opposite of the temperate Connal, who adises caution and forethought. Calmar burries Cathullin into action, which ends in defeat. Connal comforts the general in his distress — Ossian, Fingal, 1

Cal'thon, brother of Col'mar, sons of Rathmorechief of Clutha (the Clyde). The father was murdered in his halls by Duntharmo lord of Teutha (the Tweed), and the two boys were brought up by the murderer in his own house, and accompanied him in his wars. As they grew in years, Duntharmo fancied he perceived in their looks a something which excited his suspicions, so he shut them up in two separate dark caves on the banks of the Tweed. Col'mal, daughter of Duntharmo, dressed as a young warrior, liberated Calthon, and fled with him to Morven, to crave aid in behalf of the captive Colmar. Accordingly, Fingal sent his son Ossian with 300 men to effect his liberation. When Duntharmo heard of the approach of this army, he put Colmar to death. Calthon, mourning for his brother, was captured, and bound to an oak, but at daybreak Ossian slew Duntharmo, cut the thongs of Calthon, gave him to Col-mal, and they lived happily in the halls of Teutha — Ossian, Calthon and Colmal

Calumet of Peace The bowl of this pipe is made of a soft red stone easily hollowed out, the stem of cane or some light wood, painted with divers colours, and decorated with the heads, tails, and feathers of birds. When Indians enter into an alliance or solemn engagement, they smoke the calumet together. When war is the subject, the whole pipe and all its ornaments are deep red —Major Rogers, Account of North America (See RED PIPE)

*A-calumet*ing, a-courting In the daytime any act of gallantry would be deemed indecorous by the American Indians, but after sunset, the young lover goes *a-calumet*ing. He, in fact, lights his pipe, and entering the cabin of his well-beloved, presents it to her. If the lady extinguishes it, she accepts his addresses, but if she suffers it to burn on, she rejects them, and the gentleman retires —Ashe, Travels

Cal'ydōn (Prince of), Melca'ger, famed for killing the Calydonian boar —Apollod 1 S (See MELEAGER)

As did the fatal brand Althra burn'd
Unto the prince's heart of Calydon
Shakespeare Henry 11 act 1. sc. 1 (1.91)

Cal'ydōn, a town of Æto'lia, founded by Cal'ydōn. In Arthurian romance Calydon is a forest in the north of our island. Probably it is what Richard of Cirencester calls the "Caledonian Wood," westward of the Varar or Murry Frith.

Calydo'nian Hunt Artēmis, to punish Cneus [Z' nucē] king of Cal'ydōn, in Æto'lia, for neglect, sent a monster boar to ravage his vineyards. His son Melca'ger collected together a large company to hunt it. The boar being killed, a dispute arose respecting the head, and this led to a war between the Curcēs and Calydo'nians.

A similar tale is told of Theseus (2 syl.), who vanquished and killed the gigantic sow which ravaged the territory of Krommion, near Corinth (See KROMMIONIAN SOW).

Calyp'so, in Telemague, a prose-epic by Fenelon, is meant for Mde de Montespan. In mythology she was queen of the island Ogy'gia, on which Ulys'ses was wrecked, and where he was detained for seven years.

Calypso's Isle, Ogy'gia, a mythical island "in the navel of the sea." Some consider it to be Gozo, near Malta. Ogy'gia (not the island) is Bœot'ia, in Greece.

Cama'cho, "richest of men," makes grand preparations for his wedding with Quiteria, "fairest of women," but as the bridal party are on their way, Basil'us cheats him of his bride, by pretending to kill himself. As it is supposed that Basil'us is dying, Quiteria is married to him as a mere matter of form, to soothe his last moments, but when the service is over, up jumps Basil'us, and shows that his "mortal wounds" are a mere pretence —Cervantes, an episode in Don Quixote, II ii 3, 4 (1615)

Camara'zaman, prince of "the Island of the Children of Khal'edan, situate in the open sea, some twenty days' sail from the coast of Persia." He was the only child of Schah'niman and Fatima, king and queen of the island. He was very averse to marriage, but one night, by fairy influence, being shown Bidon'ra, only child of the king of China, he fell in love with her and exchanged rings. Next day both inquired what had become of the other, and the question was deemed so ridiculous that each was thought to be mad. At length Marzayan (foster-brother of the princess) solved the mystery. He induced the prince Camara'zaman to go to China, where he was recognized by the princess and married her. (The name means "the moon of the period") —Arabian Nights ("Camara'zaman and Badoura")

Cam'ballo, the second son of Camb'sen' king of Tartary, brother of Al'garsife (3 syl) and Can'neç (3 syl). He fought with two knights who asked the lady Cannec to wife, the terms being that none should have her till he had succeeded in worsting Camballo in combat. Chaucer does not give us the sequel of this tale, but Spenser says that three brothers, named Priamond, Diamond, and Triamond were suitors, and that Triamond won her. The mother of these three (all born at one birth) was Ag'apē, who dwelt in Fairy-land (bk iv 2).

Spenser makes Cambi'na (daughter of Ag'apē) the lady-love of Camballo. Camballo is also called Camballus and Cambel.

Camballo's Ring, given him by his sister Cannec, "had power to staunch all wounds that mortally did bleed."

Well mote ye wonder how that noble knight,
After he had so often wounded been
Could stand on foot now to renew the fight

All was thro' virtue of the ring he wore in him let

 Tri'amond The match between Cambel and Triamond was so evenly balanced, that both would have been killed had not Cambr'na interfered (See next art) —
 Spenser, Fairy Queen, iv 3 (1596)

Cambr'na, daughter of the fairy Ag'apô (3 syl) She had been trained in magic by her mother, and when Cam'billo, son of Cambusean', had slain two of her brothers and was engaged in deadly combat with the third (named Tri'amond), she appeared in the lists in her chariot drawn by two lions, and brought with her a cup of nepenthe, which had the power of converting hate to love, of producing oblivion of sorrow, and of inspiring the mind with celestial joy.
 Cambina touched the combatants with her wand and paralyzed them, then giving them the cup to drink, dissolved their animosity, assuaged their pains, and filled them with gladness The end was that Camballo made Cambina his wife, and Triamond married Can'acé — Spenser,
Fairy Queen, iv 3 (1596)

Cambusean', king of Sarra, in the land of Tartary, the model of all royal virtues His wife was El'feta, his two sons Al'garsife (5 syl) and Cam'billo, and his daughter Can'acé (3 syl) Chaucer accents the last syllable, but Milton erroneously throws the accent on the middle syllable
 Thus Chaucer says

And so befall that when this Cambuscan

And again

This Cambuscan of which I have you told Squire's Tale

But Milton, in Il Penseroso, says

Him who left half told
 The story of Cambuscan bold.

The accent might be preserved by a slight change, thus

Him who left of old
 The tale of Cambuscan half told.

Cambusean had three presents sent him by the king of Araby and Ind (1) a horse of brass, which would within a single day transport its rider to the most distant region of the world, (2) a trenchant sword, which would cut through the stoutest armour, and heal a sword-wound by simply striking it with the flat of the blade, (3) a mirror, which would reveal conspiracies, tell who were faithful and loyal, and in whom trust might be confided He also sent Cambusean's daughter Canacé a ring that she might know the virtues of all plants, and by aid of which she would be able to understand the language of birds, and even to converse with them — Chaucer, Canterbury

Leod'ogran the king of Camelard
Had one fair daughter and none other child
Guinevere and in her his one delight.
Tennyson Coming of Arthur

Cam'elot (3 syl) There are two places so called. The place referred to in King Lear is in Cornwall, but that of Arthurian renown was in Winchester. In regard to the first Kent says to Cornwall, "Goose, if I had you upon Sarum Plain I'd drive ye cackling bonie to Camelot," i.e. to Tintagel or Camelford, the "home" of the duke of Cornwall. But the Camelot of Arthur was in Winchester, where visitors are still shown certain large entrenchments once pertaining to "king Arthur's palace."

Sir Balin's sword was put into marble's stone standing it upright as a great millstone and it swam down the stream to the city of Camelot, that is in English Winchester—Sir T. Malory History of Prince Arthur L. 41 (12.0)

 In some places, even in Arthurian romance, Camelot seems the city on the Camel, in Cornwall. Thus, when Sir Tristram left Tintagel to go to Ireland, a tempest "drove him back to Camelot" (pt II 19)

Camilla, wife of Anselmo of Florence Anselmo, in order to rejoice in her incurable fidelity, induced his friend Lo-

thano to try to corrupt her. Thus he did, and Camilla was not trial-proof, but fell Anselmo for a time was kept in the dark, but at the end Camilla eloped with Lothario. Anselmo died of grief, Lothario was slain in battle, and Camilla died in a convent—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I. 11. 5, 6 ("Latit Curiosity," 1605)

Camille' (2 syl), in Corneille's tragedy of Les Horaces (1639). When her brother meets her and bids her congratulate him for his victory over the three ennemis, she gives utterance to her grief for the death of her lover. Horace says, "What! can you prefer a man to the interests of Rome?" Whereupon Camille denounces Rome, and concludes with these words "Où that it were my lot!" When Mlle Rachel first appeared in the character of "Camille," she took Paris by storm (1838)

Voilà le dernier Romain à son dernier sou
Moi seule en être cause et mourir de plaisir

 Whitehead has dramatized the subject and called it The Roman Father (1711)

Camillo, a lord in the Sicilian court, and a very good man. Being commanded by king Leontes to poison Polixenes, instead of doing so he gave him warning, and fled with him to Bohemia. When Polixenes ordered his son Florizel to abandon Perdita, Camillo persuaded the young lovers to seek refuge in Sicily, and induced Leontes, the king thereof, to protect them. As soon as Polixenes discovered that Perdita was Leontes' daughter, he readily consented to the union which before he had forbidden—Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale (1601)

Cam'ola, "the maid of honour," a lady of great wealth, noble spirit, and great beauty. She loved Bertoldo (brother of Roberto king of the two Sicilies), and when Bertoldo was taken prisoner at Sienna, paid his ransom. Bertoldo before his release was taken before Aurelia, the duchess of Sienna. Aurelia fell in love with him, and proposed marriage, an offer which Bertoldo accepted. The betrothed then went to Palermo to be introduced to the king, when Camilla exposed the conduct of the base young prince. Roberto was disgusted at his brother, Aurelia rejected him with scorn, and Camilla retired to a nunnery—Massinger, The Maid of Honour (1637)

Can'ace (3 syl), daughter of Cambuscan', and the paragon of women Chaucer left the tale half-told, but Spenser makes a crowd of suitors woo her Her brother Cambel or Cam'bello resolved that none should win his sister who did not first overthrow him in fight At length Triamond sought her hand, and was so nearly matched in fight with Cam'bello, that both would have been killed, if Camb'na, daughter of the fairy Ag'apë (3 syl), had not interfered Cambina gave the wounded combatants mercie, which had the power of converting enmity to love, so the combatants ceased from fight, Cam'bello took the fair Cambina to wife, and Triamond married Can'acë—Chaucer, Squire's Tale, Spenser, Fairy Queen, iv 8 (1596)

Captain of Kent So Jack Cade called himself (died 1450)

The Great Captain (el Gran Capitano), Gonzalvo di Cordova (1453-1515)

The People's Captain (el Capitano del Popolo), Giuseppe Garibaldi (1807-)

Captain (A Copper), a poor captain, whose swans are all geese, his jewellery paste, his gunners couters, his achievements tongue-doughtiness, and his whole man Brummagem

To this copper captain was confided the command of the troops.—W. Irving

Let all the world view here the captain's treasure
Here's a goodly jewel
See how it sparkles, like an old lady's eyes
And here's a chain of whittings eyes for pearls
Your clothes are parallel to the— all counterfeit.
Put these and them on, you're a man of copper
A kind of candlestick, a copper copper captain Beaumont and Fletcher Fools a Wife and Have a Wife (1643)

Captain (A led), a poor obsequious captain, who is led about as a cavalier servant by those who find him hospitality and pry nunky for him. He is not the leader of others, as a captain ought to be, but is by others led.

When you quarrel with the family of Plandib, you only leave refined cookery to be fed upon scraps by a poor con in a led captain.—Burgoyne The Heiress v 3 (1751)

Captain (The Black), lieutenant-colonel Dennis Davidoff, of the Russian army. In the French invasion he was called by the French Le Capitaine Noir.

Captain Loys [Lois] Louise Labé was so called, because in early life she embraced the profession of arms, and gave repeated proofs of great valour. She was also called La Belle Cordure. Louise Labé was a poetess, and has left several sonnets full of passion, and some good elegies (1526-1566).

Captain Right, a fictitious commander, the ideal of the rights due to Ireland. In the last century the peasants of Ireland were sworn to captain Right, as chartists were sworn to their articles of demand called their charter. Shakespeare would have furnished them with a good motto, "Use every man after his desert, and who shall 'scape whipping?" (Hamlet, act ii sc 2).

Captain Rock, a fictitious name assumed by the leader of certain Irish insurgents in 1822, etc. All notices, summonses, and so on, were signed by this name.

Captain is a Bold Man (The), a popular phrase at one time. Pechum applies the expression to captain Macleath.—Gay, The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Capucinade (4 syl) "A capucinade" is twaddling composition, or wishy-washy literature. The term is derived from the sermons of the Capuchins, which were notoriously incorrect in doctrine and debased in style.

It was a virtue di onire the rhetoric of an old professor a mere capucinade.—Lestage Gil Blas, vii 1 (1715).

Cap'ulet, head of a noble house of Verona, in feudal enmity with the house of Montague (3 syl) Lord Capulet is a jovial, testy old man, self-willed, prejudiced, and tyrannical.

Lady Capulet, wife of lord Capulet and mother of Juliet.—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1598).

Then lady Capulet comes sweeping by with her train of velvet, her black hood her fan and her racy the very beau idéal of a proud Italian matron of the fifteenth century who offer to poison Romeo in revenge for the death of Tybalt stamps her with one very characteristic trait of the age and country. Yet she loves her daughter and there is a touch of remorseful tenderness in her lamentation over her.—Mrs. Jameson.

(Lord Capulet was about 60. He had "left off masking" for above thirty years (act i sc 5), and lady Capulet was only 28, as she tells the nurse, but her daughter Juliet was a marriageable woman.)

The Tomb of all the Capulets Burlingame, in a letter to Matthew Smith, says "I would rather sleep in the corner of a little country church-yard than in the tomb of all the Capulets." It does not occur in Shakespeare.

Capys, a blind old seer, who prophesied to Romulus the military triumphs of Rome from its foundation to the destruction of Carthage.

In the hall gate sat Capys
Capys the sightless seer
From his d d foot he trembled
As I omulus drew near
And up stood stiff his thin white hair
And his blind eyes flashed fire

Lord Macaulay Days of Ancient Rome (The Prophecy of Capys, xl).

Car'abas (Le marquis de), an hypothetical title to express a fossilized old aristocrat, who supposed the whole world made for his behoof. The "king owes his throne to him," he can "trace his pedigree to Pepin," his youngest son is "sure of a mitre," he is too noble "to pay taxes," the very priests share their tithes with him, the country was made for his "hunting-ground," and, therefore, as Beranger says

Chapeau bas! chapeau bas!
Gloire au marquis de Carabas!

The name occurs in Perrault's tale of Puss in Boots, but it is Beranger's song (1816) which has given the word its present meaning.

Carac'ei of France, Jean Jouvenet, who was paralyzed on the right side, and painted with his left hand (1647-1707).

Carac'tacus or Caradoc, king of the Sil'ures (Monmouthshire, etc.). For nine years he withstood the Roman arms, but being defeated by Ostorius Scapula, the Roman general, he escaped to Brigantia (Forshire, etc.) to crave the aid of Carthusman'dua (or Cartimandua), a Roman matron married to Venu'tius, chief of those parts. Carthusmandua betrayed him to the Romans, v p 47 — Richard of Cirencester, Ancient State of Britain, i 6, 23

Caradoc was led captive to Rome, v p 51, and, struck with the grandeur of that city, exclaimed, "Is it possible that a people so wealthy and luxurious can envy me a humble cottage in Britain?" Claudius the emperor was so charmed with his manly spirit and bearing that he released him and craved his friendship.

Drayton says that Caradoc went to Rome with body naked, hair to the waist, girt with a chain of steel, and his "manly breast encased with sundry shapes of beasts. Both his wife and children were captives, and walked with him" — Polyolbion, viii (1612)

Caracul (ie Caracalla), son and successor of Severus the Roman emperor. In v p 210 he made an expedition against the Caledonians, but was defeated by Fingal. Aurelius Antonianus was called "Caracalla" because he adopted the Gaulish caracalla in preference to the Roman toga — Ossian, Comala

The Caracul of Fingal is no other than Caracalla, who (as the son of Severus) the emperor of Rome was not without reason called "The Son of the King of the World." This was A.D. 210. — Dissertation on the Era of Ossian

Caraculham'bo, the hypothetical giant of the island of Malindruma, whom don Quixote imagines he may one day conquer and make to kneel at the foot of his imaginary lady-love — Cervantes, Don Quixote, I i 1 (1603)

Car'adoc or Cradock, a knight of the Round Table. He was husband of the only lady in the queen's train who could wear "the mantle of matrimonial idelity." This mantle fitted only chaste and virtuous wives, thus, when queen Guenever tried it on —

One while it was too long, another while too short,
And wrinkled on her shoulders in most unbecom'g sort.
Percy Reliques ("Boy and the Mantle," III iii 18)

Sir Caradoc and the Boar's Head. The boy who brought the test mantle of fidelity to King Arthur's court, drew a wand three times across a boar's head and said, "There's never a cuckold who can carve that head of brawn." Knight after knight made the attempt, but only sir Cradock could carve the brawn.

Sir Cradoc and the Drink-horn. The boy furthermore brought forth a drinking-horn, and said, "No cuckold can drink from that horn without spilling the liquor." Only Cradock succeeded, and "he won the golden can" — Percy, Reliques ("Boy and the Mantle," III iii 18)

Caradoc of Men'wygent, the younger bard of Gwenwyn prince of Powys-land. The elder bard of the prince was Cadwallon — Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Car'atach or Carac'tacus, a British king brought captive before the emperor Claudius in v p 52. He had been betrayed by Cartimandua. Claudius set him at liberty.

And Leucomus suffered Caratach affords

A tragedy complete except in words.

Byron, English Bards and Scenic Reviewers (1807)

Digges (1770-1786) was the very absolute Carac'tach. The solid bulk of his frame, his action, his voice, all marked him with identity — Bowden, Life of Siddons.

Car'athis, mother of the caliph Iathick. She was a Greek, and induced her son to study necromancy, held in abhorrence by all good Mussulmans. When her son threatened to put to death every one who attempted without success to read the inscription of certain sables, Car'athis wisely said, "Content yourself, my son, with commanding their beards to be burnt. Beards are less essential to a state than men." She was ultimately carried by an asit to the abyss of Lblis, in punishment of her many crimes — W Beckford, Iathick (1781)

Carau'sius, the first British emperor (257-294). His full name was Marcus Anrelius Valerius Carausius, and as emperor of Britain he was accepted by Diocletian and Maximian, but after a vigorous reign of seven years, he was assassinated by Allectus, who succeeded him as "emperor of Britain" — See Gibbon, Decline and Fall, etc., ii 13

Cards of Compliment. When it was customary to fold down part of an address card, the strict rule was this: Right hand bottom corner turned down meant a Personal call. Right hand top corner turned down meant Condolence.

Left hand bottom corner turned down meant Congratulation

Cardan (Jerome) of Padua (1501-1576), a great mathematician and astrologer. He professed to have a demon or familiar spirit, who revealed to him the secrets of nature.

What did your Cardan and your Ptolemy tell you? Your Mercurialis and your Longomontanus (two as rogues), your harmony of chironomy with astrology?—W. Congreve Love for Love iv (1695)

Cardenio of Andalusia, of opulent parents, fell in love with Lucinda, a lady of equal family and fortune, to whom he was formally engaged. Don Fernando, his friend, however prevailed on Lucinda's father, by artifice, to break off the engagement and promise Lucinda to himself, "contrary to her wish, and in violation of every principle of honour." This drove Cardenio mad, and he haunted the Sierra Morana or Brown Mountain for about six months, as a maniac with lucid intervals. On the wedding day Lucinda swooned, and a letter informed the bridegroom that she was married to Cardenio. Next day she privately left her father's house, and took refuge in a convent, but being abducted by don Fernando, she was carried to an inn, where Fernando found Dorothea his wife, and Cardenio the husband of Lucinda. All parties were now reconciled, and the two gentlemen paired respectively with their proper wives—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I ii (1605)

Carduel or Kar'tel, Carlisle, the place where Merlin prepared the Round Table.

Care, described as a blacksmith, who "worked all night and day." His bellows, says Spenser, are Pensive's and Sighs—Fairy Queen, iv 5 (1596)

Careless, one of the boon companions of Charles Surface—Sheridan, School for Scandal (1777)

Careless (Colonel), an officer of high spirits and mercurial temper, who seeks to win Ruth (the daughter of sir Basil Thoroughgood) for his wife—F. Knight, The Honest Thieves

This farce is a mere réchauffé of The Committee, by the Hon. sir R. Howard. The names "colonel Careless" and "Ruth" are the same, but "Ruth" says her proper Christian name is "Anne."

Careless, in The Committee, was the part for which Joseph Ashbury (1638-1720) was celebrated—Chetwood, History of the Stage

(The Committee, recast by T. Knight, is called The Honest Thieves)

Careless (Nid), makes love to lady Phant—W. Congreve, The Double Dealer (1700)

Careless Husband (The), a comedy, by Colley Cibber (1704). The "careless husband" is sir Charles Easy, who has amours with different persons, but is so careless that he leaves his love-letters about, and even forgets to lock the door when he has made a liaison, so that his wife knows all, yet so sweet is her temper, and under such entire control, that she never reproaches him, nor shows the slightest indication of jealousy. Her confidence so wins upon her husband that he confesses to her his faults, and reforms entirely the evil of his ways.

Carême (Jean de), chef de cuisine of Leo X. This was a name given him by the pope for an admirable soupe maigre which he invented for Lent. A descendant of Jean was chef to the prince regent, at a salary of £1000 per annum, but he left this situation because the prince had only a ménage bourgeois, and entered the service of baron Rothschild at Paris (1784-1833)

Carey (Patriot), the poet, brother of lord Falkland, introduced by sir W. Scott in Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Cargill (The Rev Josiah), minister of St. Ronan's Well, tutor of the Hon. Augustus Bidmore (2 syl), and the suitor of Miss Augusta Bidmore, his pupil's sister—Sir W. Scott, St. Ronan's Well (time, George III)

Caribee Islands (London), now Chandos Street. It was called the Caribee Islands from its countless straits and intricate thieves' passages.

Carino, father of Zenobia the chaste troth-plight wife of Arnaldo (the lady dishonourably pursued by the governor count Clodio)—Berumont and Fletcher, The Custom of the Country (1617)

Carker (James), manager in the house of Mr. Dombey, merchant. Carker was a man of 40, of a florid complexion, with very glistening white teeth, which showed conspicuously when he spoke. His smile was like "the snarl of a cat." He was the Alastor of the house of Dombey, for he not only brought the firm to bankruptcy, but he seduced Alice Marwood (cousin of Edith, Dombey's second wife) and also induced Edith to elope with him. Edith left the wretch at Dijon, and Carker, returning to England, was run over by a railway train and killed.

John Carker, the elder brother, a junior clerk in the same firm. He twice robbed it and was forgiven.

Harriet Carker, a gentle, beautiful young woman, who married Mr Morfin, one of the employés in the house of Mr Dombey, merchant. When her elder brother John fell into disgrace by robbing his employer, Harriet left the house of her brother James (the manager) to live with and cheer her disgraced brother John—C. Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846).

Carle'gion (4 syl) or Cair-Li'gion, Chester, or the "fortress upon Dee".

Fal. Chester called of old

Drayton, Polygloton xi (1613)

Carle'ton (Capt'n), an officer in the Guards—Sir W. Scott, Peter of the Peal (time, Charles II.)

Carlisle (Frederick Howard, earl of), uncle and guardian of lord Byron (1748-1826). His tragedies are The Father's Revenge and Bellamere.

The paralytic palling of Carlisle

Lord, thürmer's petit maître pamphleteer

Byron, English Bards and Scen. Criticisms (1799)

Carlos, elder son of don Antonio, and the favourite of his paternal uncle Lewis. Carlos is a great bookworm, but when he falls in love with Angelina, he throws off his diffidence and becomes bold, resolute, and manly. His younger brother is Clodio, a mere coxcomb—C. Cibber, Love Makes a Man (1694).

Car'los (under the assumed name of the marquis D'Antas) married Ogari'ta, but as the marriage was affected under a false name it was not binding, and Ogari'ta left Carlos to marry Horace de Brienne. Carlos was a great villain. He murdered a man to steal from him the plans of some Californian mines. Then embarking in the Urania, he induced the crew to rebel in order to obtain mastery of the ship. "Gold was the object of his desire, and gold he obtained." Ultimately, his villainies being discovered, he was given up to the hands of justice—L. Stirling, The Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Carlos (Don), son of Philip II of Portugal, deformed in person, violent and vindictive disposition. Don Carlos was to have married Elizabeth of France, but his father supplanted him. Subsequently he expected to marry the arch-duchess Anne, daughter of the emperor Maximilian, but her father opposed the match. In 1864 Philip II settled the succession on Rodolph and Ernest, his nephews, declaring Carlos incapable. This drove Carlos into treason, and he joined the Netherlands in a war against his father. He was apprehended and condemned to death, but was killed in prison. This has furnished the subject of several tragedies, i.e. Otway's Don Carlos (1672) in English; those of J. G. de Campistron (1683) and M. J. de Chénier (1789) in French; J. C. F. Schiller (1798) in German; Alfieri in Italian, about the same time.

Car'los (Don), the friend of don Alonzo, and the betrothed husband of Leonora, whom he resigns to Alonzo out of friendship. After marriage, Zanga induces Alonzo to believe that Leonora and don Carlos entertain a criminal love for each other, whereupon Alonzo out of jealousy has Carlos put to death, and Leonora kills herself—Edward Young, The Revenge (1721).

Carlos (Don), husband of donna Victoria. He gave the deeds of his wife's estate to donna Laura, a courtesan, and Victoria, in order to recover them, assumed the disguise of a man, took the name of Florio, and made love to her. Having secured a footing, Florio introduced Gaspar as the wealthy uncle of Victoria, and Gaspar told Laura the deeds in her hand were utterly worthless. Laura in a fit of temper tore them to atoms, and thus Carlos recovered the estate, and was rescued from impending ruin—Mrs Cowley, A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1782).

Carlton (Admiral George), George IV., author of The Voyage of — in search of Loyalty, a poetic epistle (1820).

Cai'milhan, the "phantom ship". The captain of this ship swore he would double the Cape, whether God willed it or not, for which impious vow he was doomed to abide for ever and ever captain in the same vessel, which always appears near the Cape, but never doubles it. The kobold of the phantom ship is named Klaboterman, a kobold who helps sailors at their work, but beats those who are idle When a vessel is doomed, the hobold appears smoking a short pipe, dressed in yellow, and wearing a night-cap

Caro, the Flesh or "natural man" personified Phineas Fletcher says "this dam of sin" is a hag of loathsome shape, arrayed in steel, polished externally, but rusty within On her shield is the device of a mermaid, with the motto, "Hear, Gaze, and Die"—The Purple Island, vii (1633)

Carocrum, the banner of the Milanese having for device "St Ambrose," the patron saint of Milan It was mounted on an iron tree with iron leaves, and the summit of the tree was surmounted by a large cross The whole was rused on a red car, drawn by four red bulls, with red harness Miss was always said before the car started, and Guinefolle tells us, "toute la ceremonie etait une imitation de l'arche d'alliance des Israelites"

Le carocrum des Milanais etait au milieu entouré de 800 jeunes gens qui se tenaient unis à la vie à la mort pour le défendre Il y avait encore pour sa garde un bataillon de la mort composé de 900 cavaliers—La Bataille de Lignano 29 Mai 1170

Caroline, queen-consort of George II, introduced by sir W Scott in The Heart of Midlothian Jeanie Deans has an interview with her in the gardens at Richmond, and her majesty promises to intercede with the king for Effie Deans's pardon.

Caros or Carausius, a Roman captain, native of Belgic Gaul The emperor Maximian employed Caros to defend the coast of Gaul against the Franks and Saxons He acquired great wealth and power, but fearing to excite the jealousy of Maximian, he sailed for Britain, where (in A D 287) he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor Caros resisted all attempts of the Romans to dislodge him, so that they ultimately acknowledged his independence He repaired Agricola's wall to obstruct the incursions of the Caledonians, and while he was employed on this work was attacked by a party commanded by Oskar, son of Ossian and grandson of Fingal "The warriors of Caros fled, and Oskar remained like a rock left by the ebbing sea"—Ossian, The War of Caros

The Caros mentioned is the noted usurper Carausius who assumed the purple in the year 287 and reizing on Britain defeated the emperor Maximilian Hercules in several naval engagements which gave prophecy to his being called The King of Shells—Dictionnaire on the Era of Ossian

Car'ove (3 syl'), "a story without an end"—Mrs Austin, Translation

I must get on or my readers will anticipate that my story like Carov's more celebrated one will prove a 'story without an end'—W J Thoms Notes and Queries March 24 1877

Carpathian Wizard (The), Proteus (2 syl'), who lived in the island of Car'pathos, in the Archipelago He was a wizard, who could change his form at will Being the sea-god's shepherd, he carried a crook

(By) the Carpathian wizard's hook [crook].
Milton Comus 872 (1634)

Carpet (Prince Housain's), a magic carpet, to all appearances quite worthless, but it would transport any one who sat on it to any part of the world in a moment This carpet is sometimes called "the magic carpet of Tangu," because it came from Tangu, in Persia—Arabian Nights ("Prince Ahmed")

Carpet (Solomon's) Solomon had a green silk carpet, on which his throne was set This carpet was large enough for all his court to stand on, human beings stood on the right side of the throne, and spirits on the left When Solomon wished to travel he told the wind where to set him down, and the carpet with all its contents rose into the air and alighted at the proper place In hot weather the birds of the air, with outspread wings, formed a canopy over the whole party—Sale, Kôûân, xxvii notes

Carpet Knight (A), a civil, not a military knight

Carpet knights are men who are by the prince's grace and favour made knights at home and in the time of peace by the imposition or laying on of the king's sword having by some special service done to the commonwealth deserved this title and dignity They are called Carpet Knights because they receive their honour in the court and upon carpets (and not in the battle field)—Francis Markham Book of Honour (1613)

Carpillona (Princess), the daughter of Sublimus king of the Peaceable Islands Sublimus, being dethroned by a usurper, was with his wife, child, and a foundling boy, thrown into a dungeon, and kept there for three years The four captives then contrived to escape, but the rope which held the basket in which Carpillona was let down, snapped asunder, and she fell into the lake Sublimus and the other two lived in retirement as a shepherd family, and Carpillona, being rescued by a fisherman, was brought up by him as his daughter When the "Humpbacked" Prince dethroned the usurper of the Peaceable Islands, Carpillona was one of the captives, and the "Humpbacked" Prince wanted to make her his wife, but she fled in disguise, and came to the cottage home of Sublimus, where she fell in love with his foster-son, who proved to be half-brother of the "Humpbacked" Prince. Ultimately, Carpillona married the foundling, and each succeeded to a kingdom — Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Princess Carpillona," 1682)

Car'pio (Bernardo del), natural son of don Sanelio, and doña Ximena, surnamed "The Chaste." It was Bernardo del Carpio who slew Roland at Roncevaux (4 syl.) In Spanish romance he is a very conspicuous figure

Carras'co (Samson), son of Bartholomew Carrasco. He is a licentiate of much natural humour, who flatters don Quixote, and persuades him to undertake a second tour

He was about 24 years of age, of a pale complexion, and had good talents. His nose was remarkably flat, and his mouth remarkably wide. — Cervantes Don Quixote II 19 (1615)

He may perhaps boast, as the bachelor Samson Carrasco of fixing the weather-cock La Giraldade of Seville, for weeks, months, or years, that is, for as long as the wind shall uniformly blow from one quarter — Sir W. Scott

(The allusion is to Don Quixote, II 14)

Carrie-Thura, in the Orkney Islands, the palace of king Cathullia. It is the title of one of the Ossian poems, the subject being as follows — Fingal, going on a visit to Cathullia king of the Orkneys, observes a signal of distress on the palace, for Frothal, king of Sorn, had invested it. Whereupon, Fingal puts to flight the besieging army, and overthrows Frothal in single combat, but just as his sword was raised to slay the fallen king, Uthra, disguised in armour, interposed. Her shield and helmet "flying wide," revealed her sex, and Fingal not only spared Frothal, but invited him and Uthra to the palace, where they passed the night in banquet and in song — Ossian, Carrie-Thura

Carril, the grey-headed son of Kinfe'na bard of Cathullin, general of the Irish tribes — Ossian, Fingal

Carrillo (Fray) was never to be found in his own cell, according to a famous Spanish epigram

Like Fray Carrillo
The only place in which one cannot find him
Is his own cell.

Longfellow The Spanish Student L 5

Car'rol, deputy usher at Kenilworth

Castle — Sir W. Scott, Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Car'stone (Richard), cousin of Ada Clare, both being wards in Chancery, interested in the great suit of "Jarndyce v Jarndyce." Richard Carstone is a "handsome youth, about 19, of ingenious face, and with a most engaging laugh." He marries his cousin Ada, and lives in hope that the suit will soon terminate and make him rich. In the mean time, he tries to make two ends meet, first by the profession of medicine, then by that of law, then by the army, but the rolling stone gathers no moss, and the poor fellow dies with the sickness of hope deferred — C. Dickens Bleak House (1853)

Cartaph'ilus, the Wandering Jew of Jewish story. Tradition says he was door-keeper of the judgment hall in the service of Pontius Pilate, and as he led our Lord from the judgment hall, struck Him, saying, "Get on! Faster, Jesus!" Whereupon the Man of Sorrows replied, "I am going fast, Cartaphilus, but tarry thou till I come again." After the crucifixion, Cartaphilus was baptized by the same Ananias who baptized Paul, and received the name of Joseph. At the close of every century he falls into a trance, and wakes up after a time a young man about 30 years of age — Book of the Chronicles of the Abbey of St Albans

(This "book" was copied and continued by Matthew Paris, and contains the earliest account of the Wandering Jew, A.D. 1228. In 1242 Philip Mouskes, afterwards bishop of Tournay, wrote the "rhymed chronicle.")

Carter (Mrs Deborah), housekeeper to Surplus the lawyer — J. M. Morton, A Regular Fix

Car'thage (2 syl.) When Dido came to Africa she bought of the natives "as much land as could be encompassed with a bull's hide." The agreement being made, Dido cut the hide into thongs, so as to enclose a space sufficiently large for a citadel, which she called Bursa "the hide" (Greek, bursa, "a bull's hide")

The following is a similar story in Russian history — The Yakutshs granted to the Russian explorers as much land as they could encompass with a cow's hide, but the Russians, cutting the hide into strips, obtained land enough for the town and fort which they called Yakutsk.

Carthage of the North. Lübeck was so called when it was the head of the Hansentice League

Carthor, son of Cless'ammor and Moina, was born while Clessammor was in flight, and his mother died in childbirth. When he was three years old, Comhal (Fingal's father) took and burnt Balclutha (a town belonging to the Britons, on the Clyde), but Carthor was carried away safely by his nurse. When grown to man's estate, Carthor resolved to revenge this attack on Balclutha, and accordingly invaded Morven, the kingdom of Iingal. After overthrowing two of Iingal's heroes, Carthor was slain by his own father, who knew him not, but when Clessammor learnt that it was his own son whom he had slain, he mourned for him three days, and on the fourth he died—Ossian, Carthor

Car'ton (Sydney), a friend of Charles Darnay, whom he personally resembled. Sydney Carton loved Lucie Manette, but, knowing of her attachment to Darnay, never attempted to win her. Her friendship, however, called out his good qualities, and he nobly died instead of his friend—C. Dickens, A Tale of Two Cities (1859)

Cartouche, an eighteenth century highwayman. He is the French Dick Turpin

Car'un, a small river of Scotland, now called Carron, in the neighbourhood of Agricola's wall. The word means "wind-ing"

Ca'rus (Slow), in Garth's Dispensary, is Dr Tyson (1619-1708)

Caryatides (5 syl) or Carya'tes (4 syl), female figures in Greek costume, used in architecture to support entablatures. Ca'rya, in Arcadia, sided with the Persians when they invaded Greece, so after the battle of Thermopylæ, the victorious Greeks destroyed the city, slew the men, and made the women slaves. Praxiteles, to perpetuate the disgrace, employed figures of Carian women with Persian men, for architectural columns

Cas'ca, a blunt-witted Roman, and one of the conspirators who assassinated Julius Caesar. He is called "Honest Casca," meaning plain-spoken—Shakespeare, Julius Caesar (1607)

Casch'casch, a hideous genus, "lurch-backed, lame, and blind of one eye, with six horns on his head, and both his hands and feet hooked." The fairy Marimou'û (3 syl) summoned him to decide which was the more beautiful, "the prince Camaralzaman or the princess Badour'a," but he was unable to determine the knotty point—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura")

Casella, a musician and friend of the poet Dante, introduced in his Purgatory, ii. On arriving at purgatory, the poet sees a vessel freighted with souls come to be purged of their sins and made fit for paradise, among them he recognizes his friend Casella, whom he "woos to sing," whereupon, Casella repeats with enchanting sweetness the words of [Dante's] second canzone

Dante shall give Fame leave to set thee higher Than his Casella, whom he wooed to sing.
Met in the milder shades of purgatory.
Milton Sonnet xiii (To II Lawes).

Casket Homer, Alexander's edition with Aristotle's notes. So called because it was kept in a golden casket, studded with jewels, part of the spoil which fell into the hands of Alexander after the battle of Arbela

Cas'par, master of the horse to the baron of Arnhem. Mentioned in Donnerhugel's narrative.—Sir W. Scott, Annals of Germany (time, Edward IV)

Cas'par, a man who sold himself to Zaniel the Black Huntsman. The night before the expiration of his life-lease, he bargained for a respite of three years, on condition of bringing Max into the power of the fiend. On the day appointed for the prize-shooting, Max aimed at a dove but killed Caspar, and Zaniel carried off his victim to "his own place"—Weber's opera, Der Freischütz (1822)

Cassan'dra, daughter of Priam, gifted with the power of prophecy, but Apollo, whom she had offended, cursed her with the ban "that no one should ever believe her predictions"—Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida (1602)

Mrs Barry in characters of greatness was graceful, noble and dignified; no violence of passion was beyond the reach of her feeling and in the most melting distress and tenderness she was exquisitely affecting. Cassel (Count), an empty-headed, heartless, conceited puppy, who pries court to Amelia Wildenhaim, but is too insufferable to be endured. He tells her he "learnt delicacy in Italy, hantour in Spain, enterprise in France, prudence in Russia, sincerity in England, and love in the wilds of America," for civilized nations have long since substituted intrigue for love — Inchbald, Lovers' Vows (1800), altered from Kotzebue

Cassi, the inhabitants of Hertfordshire or Cassio — Cæsar, Commentaries

Cassib'ellaun or Cassib'elan (probably "Caswallon"), brother and successor of Lud. He was king of Britain when Julius Cæsar invaded the island. Geoffrey of Monmouth says, in his British History, that Cassibellaun routed Cæsar, and drove him back to Gaul (bk iv 3, 5). In Cæsar's second invasion, the British again vanquished him (ch 7), and "sacrificed to their gods as a thank-offering 40,000 cows, 100,000 sheep, 30,000 wild beasts, and fowls without number" (ch 8). Androgeus (4 syl) "duke of Trinovantum," with 5000 men, having joined the Roman forces, Cassibellaun was worsted, and agreed "to pay 3000 pounds of silver yearly in tribute to Rome." Seven years after this Cassibellaun died and was buried at York.

In Shakespeare's Cymbeline the name is called "Cassibelan."

* * Polyenus of Macedon tells us that Cæsar had a huge elephant armed with scales of iron, with a tower on its back, filled with archers and slingers. When this beast entered the sea, Cassibellaun and the Britons, who had never seen an elephant, were terrified, and their horses fled in affright, so that the Romans were able to land without molestation — See Drayton's Polyolbion, viii.

Cas'silane (3 syl), general of Candy and father of Annophel — Laws of Candy (1647)

Cassim, brother of Ali Baba, a Persian. He married an heiress and soon became one of the richest merchants of the place. When he discovered that his brother had made himself rich by hoards from the robbers' cave, Cassim took ten mules charged with panniers to carry away part of the same booty. "Open Sesam!" he cried, and the door opened. He filled his sacks, but forgot the magic word "Open Barclay!" he cried, but the door remained closed. Presently the robber band returned, and cut him down with their sabres. They then hacked the carcass into four parts, placed them near the door, and left the cave. Ali Baba carried off the body, and had it decently interred — Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba or the Forty Thieves")

Cas'sio (Michael), a Florentine, lieutenant in the Venetian army under the command of Othello. Simple-minded but not strong-minded, and therefore easily led by others who possessed greater power of will. Being overcome with wine, he engaged in a street-brawl, for which he was suspended by Othello, but Desdemona pleaded for his restoration. Iago made capital of this intemperance to rouse the jealousy of the Moor. Cassio's "almost" wife was Bianca, his mistress — Shakespeare, Othello (1611)

Cassio "is brave, benevolent and honest, ruled only by his want of stubbornness to resist an insidious invitation — Dr Johnson.

Castalio, son of lord Acrasto, and Polidore's twin-brother. Both the brothers loved their father's ward, Monimia "the orphan." The love of Polidore was dishonourable love, but Castalio loved her truly and married her in private. On the bridal night Polidore by treachery took his brother's place, and next day, when Monimia discovered the deceit which had been practised on her, and Polidore heard that Monimia was really married to his brother, the bride poisoned herself, the adulterer ran upon his brother's sword, and the husband stabbed himself — Otway, The Orphan (1680)

Castle Dangerous, a novel by sir W Scott, after the wreck of his fortune and repeated strokes of paralysis (1831) those who read it must remember they are the last notes of a dying swan, and forbear to scan its merits too strictly

Castle Dangerous or "The Perilous Castle of Douglas." So called because it was thrice taken from the English between 1306 and 1307

1. On Palm Sunday, while the English soldiers were at church, Douglas fell on them and slew them, then, entering the castle, he put to the sword all he found there, and set fire to the castle (March 19)

2. The castle being restored was placed under the guard of Thurwall, but Douglas disguised his soldiers as drovers, and Thurwall resolved to "pillage the rogues." He set upon them to drive off the herds, but the "drovers," being too strong for the attacking party, overpowered them, and again Douglas made himself master of the castle

3. Sir John de Walton next volunteered to hold the castle for a year and a day, but Douglas disguised his soldiers as market-men carrying corn and grass to Lanark. Sir John, in an attempt to plunder the men, set upon them, but was overmastered and slain. This is the subject of sir W Scott's novel called Castle Dangerous, but instead of the market-men "with corn and grass," the novel substitutes lady Augusta, the prisoner of Black Douglas, whom he promises to release if the castle is surrendered to him. De Walton consents, gives up the castle, and marries the lady Augusta

Castle Perilous, the habitation of lady Lionel's (called by Tennyson Lynceus). Here she was held captive by sir Ionside the Red Knight of the Red Lands. Sir Gareth overcame the knight, and married the lady — Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 120-153

* * Tennyson has poetised the tale in Gareth and Lynette, but has altered it. He has even departed from the old story by making sir Gareth marry Lynette, and leaving the lady Lynceus in the cold. In the old story Gareth marries Lionel's (or Lynceus), and his brother Gareth's marries Lynet (or Lynette)

Tennyson has quite mixed the recipe of the Arthurian allegory which is a Bunyan's Allegory of Progress. Lynette represents the people of this world or the inhabitants of the City of Destruction. Lionel represents the bride which says to the Christian, "Come!" and is the bride in heaven of those who fight the fight of faith. Castle Perilous is the City of Destructive Faith. Lynette recoils at Gareth after every conquest for the carnal mind is enmity against God. But Gareth fights the fight, and wins the bride. Tennyson makes the Christian leave the City of Destruction, conquer Apollyon and all the giants stand in sight of the Celestial City, see the Lord leading him to heaven, and then marry Lynette or the personification of the world, the flesh and the devil. — See Notes and Queries (January 19 February 16 March 16 1878)

Castruccio Castracani's Sword
When Victor Emmanuel II went to Ruscany, the path from Lucca to Pistoia was strewn with roses. At Pistoia the orphan heirs of Pucci met him, bearing a sword, and said, "This is the sword of Castruccio Castracani, the great Italian soldier, and head of the Ghibelines in the fourteenth century. It was committed to our ward and keeping till some patriot should arise to deliver Italy and make it free." Victor Emmanuel, seizing the hilt, exclaimed, "Questa è per me!" ("This is for me")—E. B. Cat (The) has been from time immemorial the familiar of witches, thus Galintha was changed by the Fates into a cat (Antoninus Liberalis, Metam. 29). Heate also, when Typhon compelled the gods and goddesses to hide themselves in animals, assumed the form of a cat (Pausanias, Deoties). Ovid says, "Tele soror Phœbi latuit"

The cat is the adage that is, Catus amat pisces, sed non vult tingere plantas ("the cat loves fish, but does not like to wet her paws")

Letting I dare not walk upon I would,
Like the poor cat I the adage.

Shakespeare Macbeth act I. sc. 7 (1606)

Good liquor will make a cat speak — Old Proverb

Not to come to swing a cat, reference is to the sport of swinging a cat to the branch of a tree as a mark to be shot at. Shakespeare refers to another variety of the sport, the cat being enclosed in a leather bottle, was suspended to a tree and shot at. "Hang me in a bottle, like a cat" (Much Ado about Nothing, act I. sc. 1), and Steevens tells us of a third variety in which the "cat" was placed in a soot-bag, hung on a line, and the players had to beat out the bottom of the bag. He who succeeded in thus liberating the cat, had the "privilege" of hunting it afterwards.

Kilkenny Cats A favourite amusement of the "good old times" with a certain regiment quartered at Kilkenny, was to tie two cats together by the tails, swing them over a line, and watch their ferocious attacks upon each other in their struggles to get free. It was determined to put down this cruel "sport," and one day, just as two unfortunate cats were swung, the alarm was given that the colonel was riding up post haste. An officer present cut through their tails with his sword and liberated the cats, which scampered off before the colonel arrived—From a correspondent, signed, R G Glenn (1, Rowden Buildings, Temple)

The Kibbenny Cats The story is that two cats fought in a saw-pit so ferociously that each swallowed the other, leaving only the tails behind to tell of the wonderful encounter—See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, for several other references to cats

Cath'lin of Clu'tha, daughter of Cathmol Duth-Carmor of Clu'ba had slain Cathmol in battle, and carried off Cathlin by force, but she contrived to make her escape and craved aid of Fingal Ossian and Oscar were selected to espouse her cause, and when they reached Rathcol (where Duth-Carmor lived), Ossian resigned the command of the battle to his son Oscar Oscar and Duth-Carmor met in combat, and the latter fell The victor carried the mail and helmet of Duth-Carmor to Cathlin, and Cathlin said, "Take the mail and place it high in Selma's hall, that you may remember the helpless in a distant land"—Ossian, Cathlin of Clutha

Cath-Lo'da. The tale is this Fingal in his youth, making a voyage to the Orkneys, was driven by stress of weather to Denmark The king Starno invited him to a feast, but Fingal, in distrust, declined the invitation. Starno then proposed to his son Swaran to surprise Fingal in his sleep, but Swaran replied, "I shall not slay in shades I move forth in light," and Starno resolved to attack the sleeper by himself. He came to the place where Fingal lay, but Fingal, hearing the step, started up and succeeded in binding Starno to an oak. At day-break he discovered it to be the king, and loosing him from his bonds he said, "I have spared thy life for the sake of thy daughter, who once warned me of an ambuscade"—Ossian, Cath-Loda (in three dnan)

Cath'mor, younger brother of Cairbar ("lord of Atha"), but totally unlike him. Cairbar was treacherous and malignant, Cathmor high-minded and hospitable. Cairbar murdered Cormac king of Ireland, and having invited Oscar (son of Ossian) to a feast, roused up a quarrel, in which both fell. Cathmor scorned such treachery. Cathmor is the second hero of the poem called Temora, and falls by the hand of Fingal (bk viii).

Cathmor the friend of strangers the brother of red-haired Cairbar. Their souls were not the same. The light of heaven was in the bosom of Cathmor. His towers rose on the banks of Atha. Seven paths led to his halls. Seven chiefs stood on the paths and called strangers to the feast. Put Cathmor dwell in the wood to shun the voice of praise.—Ossian Temora I.

Cat'thos, cousin of Madelon, brought up by her uncle Gor'gibus, a plain citizen in the middle rank of life. These two silly girls have had their heads turned by novels, and thinking their names commonplace, Catbos calls herself Aminta, and her cousin adopts the name of Polix'ena. Two gentlemen wish to marry them, but the girls consider their manners too unaffected and easy to be "good style," so the gentlemen send their valets to represent the "marquis of Mascarille" and the "viscount of Jodelet." The girls are delighted with these "distinguished noblemen," but when the game has gone far enough, the masters enter, and lay bare the trick. The girls are taught a useful lesson, without being involved in any fatal ill consequences.—Molière, Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Cathul'la, king of Inistore (the Or'neys) and brother of Coma'la (qv). Fingal, on coming in sight of the place, observed a beacon-flame on its top as signal of distress, for Frothal king of Sora had besieged it. Fingal attacked Frothal, engaged him in single combat, defeated him, and made him prisoner.—Ossian, Carriel-Thura.

Cat'iline (3 syl), a Roman patrician, who headed a conspiracy to overthrow the Government, and obtain for himself and his followers all places of power and trust. The conspiracy was discovered by Cicero. Catiline escaped and put himself at the head of his army, but fell in the battle after fighting with desperate daring (nc 62). Ben Jonson wrote a tragedy called Catiline (1611), and Voltaire, in his Rome Sauvée, has introduced the conspiracy and death of Catiline (1752).

Ca'to, the hero and title of a tragedy by J. Addison (1713). Disgusted with Caesar, Cato retired to Utica (in Africa), where he had a small republic and mimic senate, but Caesar resolved to reduce Utica as he had done the rest of Africa, and Cato, finding resistance hopeless, fell on his own sword.

Caxton (Pisistratus), the hero of Bulwer's novel The Caxtons, and the feigned author of its sequel, called My Novel (1853), as well as of the essays entitled Caxtoniana (1863).

Ceca to Mecca (From), from pillar to post. To saunter or ramble from Ceca to Mecca is a Spanish proverb, meaning to roam about purposelessly or idly. Ceca and Mecca are two places visited by Mohammedan pilgrims

* Let us return home "old Sancho" nor longer ramble from Ceca to Mecca. — Cervantes Don Quixote i. iii. 4 (1590)

Cecil, the hero of a novel so called by Mrs. Goro (1790-1861)

Cecil's Fast, an Act of Parliament by W. Cecil, lord Burleigh, to enjoin the eating of fish on certain days. The object of this Act was to restore the fish trade, which had been almost ruined by the Reformation. Papists eat fish on fast-days, and at the Reformation the eating of fish being looked on as a badge of bad faith, no one was willing to lie under the suspicion of being a papist, and no one would buy fish

Cecilia (St), the patroness of musicians and "inventor of the organ." The legend says that an angel fell in love with Cecilia for her musical skill, and nightly brought her roses from paradise. Her husband saw the angel visiting, who gave to both a crown of martyrdom

The next morning he was

Ce'dric, athane of Rotherwood, and surnamed "the Saxon" — Sir W. Scott, Jeanhoe (time, Richard I)

Celadon and Amelia, lovers of matchless beauty, and most devoted to each other. Being overtaken by a thunderstorm, Amelia became alarmed, but Celadon, folding his arm about her, said, "Thy safety to be near thee, sure," but while he spoke, Amelia was struck by lightning and fell dead in his arms — Thomson, The Seasons ("Summer," 1727)

(Celadon, like Chloe, Celia, Lesbia, Daphnē, etc., may be employed to signify a lady-love generally.)

Celē'no or Celæ'no, chief of the harpies

(1510)

Celestial City (The). Heaven is so called by John Bunyan, in his Pilgrim's Progress (1678)

Celestial Empire, China, so called because the first emperors were all "celestial deities" as Puon-hu ("highest eternity"), Tiēn-Hoang ("emperor of heaven"), Ti-Hoang ("emperor of earth"), Gien-Hoang ("emperor of men"), etc., embracing a period of 300,000 years previous to To-hi, whose reign is placed B.C. 2953-2838

Celia, daughter of Frederick the usurping duke, and cousin of Rosalind, daughter of the banished duke. When Rosalind was driven from her uncle's court, Celia determined to go with her to the forest of Arden to seek out the banished duke, and for security sake, Rosalind dressed in boy's clothes and called herself "Ganymed," while Celia dressed as a peasant girl and called herself "Alcina." When they reached Arden they lodged for a time in a shepherd's hut, and Oliver de Boys was sent to tell them that his brother Orlando was hurt and could not come to the hut as usual. Oliver and Celia fell in love with each other, and their wedding day was fixed. Ganymed resumed the dress of Rosalind, and the two brothers married at the same time.—Shakespeare, As You Like It (1598).

Celia, a girl of 16, in Whitehead's comedy of The School for Lovers. It was written expressly for Mrs Cibber, daughter of Dr Arne.

Mrs Cibber was at the time more than 60 years old, but the uncommon symmetry and exact proportion in her form, with her singular vivacity, enabled her to represent the character of "Celia" with all the juvenile appearance marked by the author.—Perry Anecdotes, etc.

Celia, a poetical name for any lady-love as "Would you know my Celia's charms?" Not unfrequently Strephon is the wooer when Celia is the wooed. Thomas Carew calls his "sweet sweetening" Celia, her real name is not known.

Celia (Dame), mother of Faith, Hope, and Charity. She lived in the hospice called Holiness (Celia is from the Latin, cælum, "heaven")—Spenser, Fairy Queen, i 10 (1590).

Celidon, the scene of one of Arthur's twelve battles, also called "Celidon-the-Forest," and said to be Trecedale. Celiddon was a common term for a British forest.

Célimène (3 syl), a coquette courted by Alceste (2 syl) the "misanthrope" (a really good man, both upright and manly, but blunt in behaviour, rude in speech, and unconventional). Alceste wants Célimène to forsake society and live with him in seclusion, this she refuses to do, and he replies, as you cannot find, "tout en moi, comme moi tout en vous, allez, je vous refuse." He then proposes to her cousin Eliante (3 syl), but Eliante tells him she is already engaged to his friend Philinte (2 syl), and so the play ends.—Molière, Le Misanthrope (1666).

"Célimène" in Molière's Les Précieuses.

Ridicules is a mere dummie. She is brought on the stage occasionally towards the end of the play, but never utters one word, and seems a supernumerary of no importance at all.

Celn'da, the victim of count Fathom's seduction.—Smollett, Count Fathom (1751).

The count placed an Eolian harp in her bedroom and the strings so soon felt the impression of the wind that they began to pour forth a stream of melody more ravishingly delightful than the song of Philomel, the warbling brook, and all the concert of the wood.—Smollett, Count Fathom.

Celinde (2 syl), beloved by Valentine and his son Francisco. The lady naturally prefers the younger man.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Mons Thomas (1619).

Celtic and Iberian Fields (The), France and Spain.

Rivalling the Celtic and Iberian fields.
Bill ten Cornes 60 (1634).

Celtic Homer (The), Ossian, said to be of the third century.

If Ossian lived at the introduction of Christianity as by all appearance he did, his epoch will be the latter end of the third and beginning of the fourth century.

The "Carcul" of Fingal who is no other than Caracalla (son of Severus emperor of Rome) and the battle fought against Caros or Caracalla. At the epoch of Fingal to the third century, and Irish historians place his death in the year 253. Ossian was Fingal's son.—Encyclopædia.

Cenci. Francesco Cenci was a most profligate Roman noble, who had four sons and one daughter, all of whom he treated with abominable cruelty. It is said that he assassinated his two elder sons and debauched his daughter Beatrice. Beatrice and her two surviving brothers, with Lucretia (their mother), conspired against Francesco and accomplished his death, but all except the youngest brother perished on the scaffold, September 11, 1601. (See Quarterly Review, Feb., 1879).

It has been doubted whether the famous portrait in the Barberini palace at Rome is that of Beatrice Cenci, and even whether Guido Reni was the painter thereof.

Percy B. Shelley wrote a tragedy called The Cenci (1819).

Cenimag'n, the inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge.—Caesar, Commentaries.

Centaur (The Blue), a human form from the waist upwards, and a goat covered with blue shag from the waist downwards Like the Ogrî, he fed on human flesh

Shepherds "said he I am the Blue Centaur If you will give me every third year a young child I promise to bring a hundred of my kinsmen and drive the Ozlaway"

He (the Blue Centaur) used to appear on the top of a rock with his club in one hand and with a terrible voice cry out to the shepherds, Leave me my prey and be off with you! — Comtesse D'Anjou Fairy Tales (Princess Carpiolona, 1632)

Cent'ury White, John White, the nonconformist lawyer So called from his chief work, entitled The First Century of Scandalous, Malignant Priests, etc (1690-1615)

Ce'phal (Greek, Kephale), the Head personified, the "acropolis" of The Purple Island, fully described in canto 7 of that poem, by Phineas Fletcher (1633)

Ceph'alus (in Greek, Kephālos) One day, overcome with heat, Cephalus threw himself on the grass, and cried aloud, "Come, gentle Aura, and this heat allay!" The words were told to his young wife Procris, who, supposing Aura to be some rival, became furiously jealous. Resolved to discover her rival, she stole next day to a covert, and soon saw her husband come and throw himself on the bank, crying aloud, "Come, gentle Zephyr, come, Aura, come, this heat allay!" Her mistake was evident, and she was about to throw herself into the arms of her husband, when the young man, roused by the rustling, shot an arrow into the covert, supposing some wild beast was about to spring on him. Procris was shot, told her tale, and died — Ovid, Art of Love, iii

(Ceph'alus loves Procris, i.e. "the sun kisses the dew" Procris is killed by Cephalus, i.e. "the dew is destroyed by the rays of the sun")

Ceras'tes (3 syl), the horned snake (Greek, keras, "a horn") Milton uses the word in Paradise Lost, v 525 (1665)

Cerberus, a dog with three heads, which keeps guard in hell Dante places it in the third circle

Cerberus, cruel monster fierce and strange Through his wide threefold throat barks as a dog His eyes glare crimson black his unctuous beard, His belly large, and clawed the hands with which He tears the spirits, flays them and their limbs Precarious disparts

Dante, Hell vi. (1300 Cary's translation)

Cor'don, the boldest of the noble leaders in the encounter with Hu'dibras at the bear-baiting The original of this character was Hewson, a one-eyed cobbler and preacher, who was also a colonel in the Rump army — S Butler, Hu'dibras, 1 2 (1663)

Ce'res (2 syl), the Fruits of Harvest personified In classic mythology Ceres means "Mother Earth," the protectress of agriculture and fruits

Ce'res, the planet, is so called because it was discovered from the observatory of Palermo, and Ceres is the tutelary goddess of Sicily

Cerett'ick Shore (The), the Cardigan coast

the other floods from the Cerettick shore
To the Virginian sea (v) contributing their store
Dryden Polioptilon vi (1617)

Cer'im'on, a physician of Iphesus, who restored to animation Thmisa, the wife of Pericles prince of Tyre, supposed to be dead — Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608)

Chab'ot (Philippe de), admiral of France, governor of Bourgoyne and Normandy, under François I Montmorency, and the cardinal de Lorraine, out of jealousy, accused him of malversation, his faithful servant Allegre was put to the rack to force evidence against the accused, and Chabot was sent to prison because he was unable to pay the fine levied upon him His innocence, however, was established by the confession of his enemies, and he was released, but disgrace had made so deep an impression on his mind that he sickened and died This is the subject of a tragedy, entitled The Tragedy of Philip Chabot, etc, by George Chapman and James Shirley

Chad'band (The Rev Mr), type of a canting hypocrite "in the ministry" He calls himself "a vessel," is much admired by his dupes, and pretends to despise the "carnal world," but nevertheless loves dearly its "good things," and is most self-indulgent — C Dickens, Black House (1853)

Chaffington (Mr Percy), M P, a stock-broker — I M Morton, If I had a Thousand a Year

Chalbrook, the giant, the root of the race of giants, including Polyphemus (3 syl), Goliath, the Titans, Tiernbras, Gargantua, and closing with Pantagruel He was born in the year known for its "week of three Thursdays" — Rabelais, Pantagruel, ii (1533)

Chalybes (3 syl), a people on the south shore of the Black Sea, who occupied themselves in the working of iron.

On the left hand dwell
The Iron workers called the Chalybes
Of whom beware
E. B Browning, Prometheus Bound (1850).

Cham, the pseudonym of comte Amédée de Noé, a peer of France, a great wit, and the political caricaturist of Charivari (the French Punch). The count was one of the founders of the French Republic in 1875. As Cham or Ham was the second son and scapegrace of Noah, so Amédée was the second son and scapegrace of the comte de Noé [Noah].

The Great Cham of Literature Dr Samuel Johnson was so called by Smollett in letter to John Wilkes (1709-1784).

Cham of Taitary, a corruption of Chan or Khan, i.e. "lord or prince," as Hocota Chan "Ulu Chan" means "great lord," "ulu" being equal to the Latin magnus, and "chan" to dominus or imperator. Sometimes the word is joined to the name, as Chan-balu, Cara-chan, etc. The Turks have also had their "Sultan Murad chan bin Sultan Selim chan," i.e. Sultan Murad prince, son of Sultan Selim prince—Selden, Titles of Honour, ii 66 (1672).

Chamont, brother of Monimia "the orphan," and the troth-plight husband of Serina (daughter of lord Acasto). He is a soldier, so proud and susceptible that he is for ever taking offence, and setting himself up as censor or champion. He fancies his sister Monimia has lost her honour, and calls her to task, but finds he is mistaken. He fancies her guardian, old Acasto, has not been sufficiently watchful over her, and draws upon him in his anger, but sees his folly just in time to prevent mischief. He fancies Castalio, his sister's husband, has ill-treated her, and threatens to kill him, but his suspicions are again altogether erroneous. In fact, his presence in the house was like that of a mad man with fire-brands in a stack-yard —Otway, The Orphan (1680).

There are characters in which he [C. M. Young] is unrivalled and almost perfect. His More [i.e. Preferred Otway] is more soldierly than Kemble's, his Chamont is full of brotherly pride noble intemperance and heroic scorn —New Monthly Magazine (1870).

Champagne (Henry earl of), a crusader —Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I.)

Cham'pernel, a lame old gentleman, the husband of Lami'ra, and son-in-law of judge Vertaigne (2 syl) —Beaumont and Fletcher, The Little French Lawyer (1647).

Champion and Severall. A "champion" is a common, or land in allotments without enclosures. A "severall" is a private farm, or land enclosed for individual use. A "champion" also means one who holds an open allotment or "champion."

More profit I gather found (Where pastures in several be)
Of one seely acre of ground
Than champion meekness of three Acres what a joy it is known
When men may be bold of their own!
Tusser Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry lib 22

Again

The champion differs from severall much
For want of partition closer and such Tusser (intr) (1657)

Champion of the Virgin. St Cyril of Alexandria is so called from his defence of the "Incarnation" or doctrine of the "hypostatic union," in the long and stormy dispute with Nestorius bishop of Constantinople.

Champneys (Sir Geoffrey), a fossilized old country gentleman, who believes in "blue blood" and the "British peerage." Father of Talbot, and neighbour of Perkin Middlewick, a retired buttermilkman. The sons of these two magnates are fast friends, but are turned adrift by their fathers for marrying in opposition to their wishes. When reduced to abject poverty, the old men go to visit their sons, relent, and all ends happily.

Talbot Champneys, a swell with few brains and no energy. His name, which was his passport into society, would not find him in salt in the battle of life. He marries Mary Melrose, a girl without a penny, but his father wanted him to marry Violet the heiress.

Miss Champneys, Sir Geoffrey's sister, proud and aristocratic, but quite willing to sacrifice both on the altar of Mr Perkin Middlewick, the buttermilkman, if the wealthy plebeian would make her his wife, and allow her to spend his money —H. J. Byron, Our Boys (1875).

Chandos House (Cavendish Square, London), so called from being the residence of James Brydges, duke of Chandos, generally called "The Princely Chandos."

Chandos Street (See CARIBEL ISLANDS)

Chan'ticleer (3 syl), the cock, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498), and also in "The Nonne Prestre's Tale," told in The Canterbury Tales, by Chaucer (1388)

Chaon'ian Bird (The), the dove, so called because doves delivered the oracles of Dodōna or Chaon'ia

But the mild swallow none with tolls infect,
And none the soft Chaonian bird molest.

Ovid, Art of Love II.

Chaonian Food, acorns, so called from the oak trees of Dodōna, which gave out the oracles by means of bells hung among the branches. Beech mast is so called also, because beech trees abounded in the forest of Dodona

Chapelle Aventureuse, the place where Launcelot had his second vision of the "Beastie Cup." His first was during his fit of madness

Slumbering he saw the vision high
He might not view with waking eye

Sir W. Scott, Marmion (1808)

Characters of Vathek's Sabres
"Like the characters of Vathek's sabres, they never remained two days alike." These sabres would deal blows without being wielded by man, obedient to his wish only.—W. Beckford, Vathek (1784)

Charalois, son of the marshal of Burgundy. When he was 28 years old, his father died in prison at Dijon, for debts contracted by him for the service of the State in the wars. According to the law which then prevailed in France, the body of the marshal was seized by his creditors, and refused burial. The son of Charalois redeemed his father's body by his own, which was shut up in prison in lieu of the marshal's.—Philip Massinger, The Fatal Dowry (1632)

(It will be remembered that Milti'adēs, the Athenian general, died in prison for debt, and the creditors claimed the body, which they would not suffer to be buried till his son Cimon gave up himself as a hostage.)

Char'egite (3 syl.) The Charegite assassin, in the disguise of a Turkish marabout or enthusiast, comes and dances before the tent of Richard Cœur de Lion, and suddenly darting forward, is about to stab the king, when a Nubian seizes his arm, and the king kills the assassin on the spot.—Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I.)

Charicle'ia, the fiancée of Theag'enēs, in the Greek romance called The Loves of

Theag'enēs and Charicle'ia, by Heliodorus bishop of Trikka (fourth century)

Charino, father of Angelina. Charino wishes Angelina to marry Clodio, a young coxcomb, but the lady prefers his elder brother Carlos, a young bookworm. Love changes the character of the diffident Carlos, and Charino at last accepts him for his son-in-law. Charino is a testy, obstinate old man, who wants to rule the whole world in his own way.—C. Cibber, Love Makes the Man (1694)

Charivarri. In the middle ages a "charivarri" consisted of an assemblage of ragamuffins, who, armed with tin pots and pans, fire-shovels, and kettles, gathered in the dark outside the house of any obnoxious person, making the night hideous by striking the pots against the pans, and howling "Harro! harro!" or (in the south) "Hari! hari!" In 1563, the Council of Trent took the matter up, and solemnly interdicted "charivaries" under pain of excommunication, nevertheless, the practice continues in France to this day, notably in the village of La Ruscade

In East Lavant, near Chichester, between 1869 and 1872, I have witnessed three such visitations made to different houses. In two cases the husband had bullied his wife, and in one the wife had injured her husband with a broomstick. The visitation in all cases was made for three successive nights, and the villagers assured me confidently that the "law had no power to suppress these demonstrations."

Charlemagne and His Paladins. This series of romances is of French origin, as the Arthurian is Welsh or British. It began with the legendary chronicle in verse, called Historia de Vita Carola Magni et Rolandi, erroneously attributed to Turpin archbishop of Rheims (a contemporary of Charlemagne), but probably written 200 or 300 years later. The chief of the series are Huon of Bordeaux, Guerin de Monglarc, Gaylen Rhetore (in which Charlemagne and his paladins proceed in mufti to the Holy Land), Miles and Ames, Jaridain de Blaves, Doolia de Mayence, Ogier le Danois, and Maugis the Enchanter.

Charlemagne's Stature. We are told that Charlemagne was "eight feet high," and so strong that he could "straighten with his hands alone three horse-shoes at once." His diet and his dress were both as simple as possible.

Charlemagne's Wife (1) Humilfride, a poor Frenchwoman, who bore him several children (2) Desideria, who was divorced (3) Hildegard, (4) Luitgarde, daughter of count Rodolph the Saxon (5) Luitgarde the German. The last three died before him (6) Matilda (7) Gertrude the Saxon (8) Regina (9) Adalinda

Charlemagne's Sword, La Joyeuse

Charlemagne and the Ring Parquier says that Charles le Grand fell in love with a peasant girl (Agatha), in whose society he seemed bewitched, inasmuch that all matters of State were neglected by him, but the girl died, to the great joy of all. What, however, was the astonishment of the court to find that the king seemed no less bewitched with the dead body than he had been with the living, and spent all day and night with it, even when its smell was quite offensive. Archbishop Turpin felt convinced there was sorcery in this strange infatuation, and on examining the body, found a ring under the tongue, which he removed. Charlemagne now lost all regard for the dead body, but followed Turpin, with whom he remained infatuated. The archbishop now bethought him of the ring, which he threw into a pool at Aix, where Charlemagne built a palace and monastery, and no spot in the world had such attractions for him as Aix-la-Chapelle, where "the ring" was buried—Lecherches de la Biographie, vi 33

Charlemagne not dead According to legend, Charlemagne waits crowned and armed in Odenberg (Hesse) or Lüneberg, near Saltzburg, till the time of antichrist, when he will wake up and deliver Christendom (See Barbarossa)

Charlemagne and Year of Plenty According to German legend, Charlemagne appears in seasons of plenty. He crosses the Rhine on a golden bridge, and blesses both corn-fields and vineyards

There is a sort of Imperial Charlemagne upon the bridge of gold.

Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy, introduced by sir W. Scott in two novels, viz., Otello and Annals of the North. The latter novel contains an account of the battle of Nancy, where Charles was slain

Charles prince of Wales (called "Babe Charles") son of James I., introduced by sir W. Scott in The Fortunes of Nigel

Charles "the Good," earl of Flanders. In 1127 he passed a law that whoever married a serf should become a serf, thus if a prince married a serf, the prince would become a serf. This absurd law caused his death, and the death of the best blood in Bruges—S. Knowles, The Fortunes of Bruges (1834)

Charles Edward (Stuart), called "The Chevalier Prince Charles Edward, the Young Pretender," introduced by sir W. Scott in Rob Roy (time, George III.), first as "father Buonaventura," and afterwards as "Pretender to the British crown." He is again introduced in Warley (time, George II.)

Charles Emmanuel son of Victor Amadeus (1811) King of Sardinia. In 1700 his father abdicated, but somewhat later wanted his son to restore the crown again. This he refused to do, and when Victor plotted against him, Victor's son was sent to arrest the old man, and he died. Charles was brave, patient, single-minded, and truthful—R. Brownings, King Victor and King Charles, etc.

Charles's Wain, the constellation called The Great Bear, a corruption of the old English word char (the churl or farmer's waggon), sometimes still further corrupted into "King Charles's wain"

It is not for the day that he banded
The wain is over the new thony
The wain is not for the day that he banded
The wain is over the new thony

Could he not be the day that he banded
The wain is over the new thony

Charley (A), an imperial, or tuft of hair on the chin

A tuft of hair on his chin termed grandiloquently an imperial, but familiarly a "Charley"—P. M. Jenson, The Girl He Left behind Him 15

Charley, plu Charleys, an old watchman or "night guardian," before the introduction of the police force by sir Robert Peel, in 1829. So called from Charles I, who extended and improved the police system

Charlot, a messenger from Liège to Louis XI.—Sir W. Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.)

Charlotte, the faithful sweetheart of young Wilmot, supposed to have perished at sea.—Geo. Lillo, Fatal Curiosity (1736)

Charlotte, the dumb girl, in love with Leander, but her father, sir Jasper, wants her to marry Mr. Dapper. In order to avoid this hateful alliance, Charlotte pretends to be dumb, and only answers, "Hau, hi, han, hon." The "mock doctor" employs Leander as his apothecary, and the young lady is soon cured by "pills matrimoniales." In Molière's Le Médecin Malgré Lui, Charlotte is called "Lucinde." The jokes in act ii. 6 are verbally copied from the French.—H. Fielding, The Mock Doctor

Charlotte, daughter of sir John Lambert, in The Hypocrite, by Is. Bickerstaff (1768), in love with Darnley. She is a giddy girl, fond of tormenting Darnley, but being promised in marriage to Dr. Cantwell, who is 50, and whom she utterly detests, she becomes somewhat sobered down, and promises Darnley to become his loving wife. Her constant exclamation is "Lud!" In Molière's comedy of Tartuffe, Charlotte is called "Mariane," and Darnley is "Valere."

Charlotte, the pert maid-servant of the countess Winterson. Her father was "state coachman." Charlotte is jealous of Mrs. Haller, and behaves rudely to her (see act ii. 3).—Benjamin Thompson, The Stranger (1797)

Charlotte, servant to Sowerberry. A dishonest, rough servant-girl, who ill-treats Oliver Twist, and robs her master.—C. Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Charlotte (Lady), the servant of a lady so called. She assumes the airs with the name and address of her mistress. The servants of her own and other households address her as "Your ladyship," or "lady Charlotte," but though so mighty grand she is "noted for a plucky pair of thick legs"—Rev. James Townley, High Life Below Stairs (1759)

Charlotte Elizabeth, whose surname was Phelan, afterwards Tonnar, author of numerous books for children tales, etc. (1825-1862)

Charlotte Goodchild, a merchant's orphan daughter of large fortune. She is pestered by many lovers, and her guardian gives out that she has lost all her money by the bankruptcy of his house. On this all her suitors but one call off, and that one is sir Callaghan O Brallaghan, who declares he loves her now as an equal, and one whom he can serve, but before he loved her "with fear and trembling, like a man that loves to be a soldier, yet is afraid of a gun"—C. Macklin, Lore a-la-mode (1776)

Char'mian, a kind-hearted, simple-minded attendant on Cleopatra. After the queen's death, she applied one of the asps to her own arm, and when the Roman soldiers entered the room, fell down dead.—Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra (1608), and Dryden, All for Love

Charyllis, in Spenser's pastoral Colin Clout's Come Home Again, is lady Compton. Her name was Anne, and she was the fifth of the six daughters of sir John Spenser of Althorpe, ancestor of the noble houses of Spenser and Marlborough. Edmund Spenser dedicated to her his satirical fable called Mother Hubbard's Tale (1591). She was three married, her first husband was lord Montegle, and her third was Robert lord Buckhurst (son of the poet Sackville), who succeeded his father in 1608 as earl of Dorset.

No less praiseworthy are the girls three,
The honour of the noble family
Of which I meanest boast myself to be,
Phyllis, Charyllis, and sweet Amaryllis.
Phyllis the first is eldest of the three
The next to her is beautiful Charyllis.

Chau'nus, Arrogance personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1633) "Fondly himself with praising he dispraised" Fully described in canto viii (Greek, chaunos, "vain")

Chau'vinism, a blind idolatry of Napoleon I Now it is applied to French jinjoism and Bobadilism

Chauvin patriote ardent, jusqu'à exagération.
Allusion au nom d'un type de caricatures populaires, comme le prouve cet exemple 1825 époque où un libé-ralisme plus large commença à se moquer de ces éloges donnés aux Français par les Français, de ces rueries lancées par les Français contre les étrangers. Charet, en créant le conscript Chauvin, fit justice des ces niaises de l'opinion.—Lorédan Larchey Dict de l'Argot Parisien (1872).

Fuch is the theme on which French chauvinism is inextricably—Times 1871.

Cheap as the Sardinians (Latin) The reference is to the vast crowds of Sardinian prisoners and slaves brought to Rome by Tiberius Gracchus

Cheap Jack means market Jack or Jack the chapman (Anglo-Saxon, chepe, "a market," hence Cheap-side)

Cheat'y (2 syl), a lewd, imprudent

debauchee of Alsatia (Whitefrans) He dares not leave the "refuge" by reason of debt, but in the precincts he fleeces young heirs of entail, helps them to money, and becomes bound for them—Shadwell, Squire of Alsatia (1688)

Che'bar, the tutelal angel of Mary, sister of Martha and Lazarus of Bethany—Klopstock, The Messiah, xii (1771)

Ched'eraza'de (5 syl), mother of Hemjunnah and wife of Zebene'zer sultan of Cassimir Her daughter having run away to prevent a forced marriage with the prince of Georgia, whom she had never seen, the sultan pined away and died—Sir C Morell [J Ridley], Tales of the Genu ("Princess of Cassimir," tale vii, 1751)

Cheder'les (3 syl), a Moslem hero, who, like St George, saved a virgin exposed to the tender mercies of a huge dragon He also drank of the waters of immortality, and lives to render aid in war to any who invoke it

When Cheder'les comes To aid the Moslem on his deathless horse as if he had never quaffed
The hidden waters of eternal youth.
Southey Joan of Arc vi. 392, c. c. (1837).

Cheeney (Iran'), an outspoken bachelor He marries Kate Tyson—Walter Reeve, Parted

Cheerly' (Mrs), daughter of colonel Woodley After being married three years, she was left a widow, young, handsome, rich, lively, and gay She came to London, and was seen in the opera by Frank Heartall, an open-hearted, impulsive young merchant, who fell in love with her, and followed her to her lodging Perret, the villain of the story, misinterpreted all the kind actions of Frank, attributing his gifts to hush-money, but his character was amply indicated, and "the soldier's daughter" became his blooming wife—Cherry, The Soldier's Daughter (1801)

Mrs O'Neill at the age of 19 made her debut at the Theatre Royal, Crow Street in 1811 as The Widow Cheerly—W Donaldson.

Cheeryble Brothers (The), brother Ned and brother Charles, the incarnations of all that is warm-hearted, generous, benevolent, and kind They were once homeless boys running about the streets barefooted, and when they grew to be wealthy London merchants, were ever ready to stretch forth a helping hand to those struggling against the buffets of fortune.

Frank Cheeryble, nephew of the brother's Cheeryble. He married Kate Nickleby —C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Cheese Tho "ten topping guests" (See CISELY)

Cheese (Dr), an English translation of the Latin Dr Cascus, that is, Dr John Chase, a noted quack, who was born in the reign of Charles II, and died in that of queen Anne

Cheese-Cakes Sir W Scott, alluding to the story of "Nour'eddin' Ali and Bed'reddin' Hassan," in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, makes in four or five lines as many blunders. The quotation is from The Heart of Midlothian

She i.e. Effie Deans amused herself with visiting the dairy and was near discovering herself to Mary Hefley by betraying her acquaintance with the celebrated receipt for Dunlop cheese that she compared herself to Bed'reddin Hassan whom the sister his father in law discovered by his superlative skill in composing cream-tarts with pepper in them.

(1) It was not "cream-tarts" but cheese-cakes (2) The charge was that he made cheese-cakes without putting pepper in them, and not "cream-tarts with pepper" (3) It was not "the vizier his father-in-law," but the widow of Nour'eddin Ali and the mother of Bed'reddin, who made the discovery. She declared that she herself had given the receipt to her son, and it was known to no one else

Chemistry (The Father of), Arnaud de Villeneuve (1238-1814)

Che'mos (ch=k), god of the Moabites, also called Baal-Pe'or, the Priapus or idol of turpitude and obscenity. Solomon built a temple to this obscene idol "in the hill that is before Jerusalem" (1 Kings xi 7). In the hierarchy of hell Milton gives Chemos the fourth rank (1) Satan, (2) Beelzebub, (3) Moloch, (4) Chemos

Next Chemos, the obscene dread of Moab's sons
Peel his other name.

Paradise Lost 406 412 (1665)

Chequ'ers, a public-house sign, the arms of Fitz-Warren, the head of which house, in the days of the Plantagenets, was invested with the power of licensing vintners and publicans

Chevalier Malfet (Je). So sir Launcelot calls himself after he was cured of his madness. The meaning of the phrase is "The knight who has done ill," or "The knight who has trespassed"—Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, iii 20 (1470).

Cheveril (Hans), the ward of Mordecai, just come of age. Impulsive, generous, hot-blooded. He resolves to be a rake, but seems to be a villain. However, he accidentally meets with Joanna "the deserted daughter," and falls in love with her. He rescues her from the clutches of Mrs Infield the crimp, and marries her.—Holcroft, The Deserter Daughter (altered into The Steward).

The part that played in [Walter Lacy] in the role of a light comedian was "Cheveril" in The Steward altered from Holcroft's Deserter Daughter.—W Lacy letter to W C Russell.

Chevy Chase is not the battle of Otterburn, although the two are mixed up together in the ballad so called. Chevy Chase is the chase of the earl of Douglas among "the Cheviat Hys" after Percy of Northumberland, who had vowed "he would hunt there three days without asking the warden's consent."

The Pers' out of Northumbria arde,
And a vow to God made he
That he wou'd hunt in the countreys
Off Christ within dayes thre
In masege of doubtles Dogles
And all that with him be

Chib'abos, the Harmon, of Nature

personified, a musician, the friend of Hiawatha, and ruler in the land of spirits. When he played on his pipe, the "brooks ceased to murmur, the wood-birds to sing, the squirrel to chatter, and the rabbit sat upright to look and listen." He was drowned in Lake Superior by the breaking of the ice.

Most beloved by Hiawatha
Was the gentle Chib'abos
He the best of all musicians,
He the sweetest of all singers.

Longfellow Hiawatha vi. and xv

Chicaneau [She' la no'], a litigious tradesman, in Les Plaideurs, by Racine (1668).

Chich'i-Vache (3 syl), a monster that fed only on good women. The word means the "sorry cow." It was all skin and bone, because its food was so extremely scarce. (See BYCORN.)

O noble wyes, full of hel's prudence,
Let noon burnillie your tongues mayle

Let Chich'i Vache you swallow in her entrails
Chaucer Canterbury Tales ("The Envoy") 9904.

Chick (Mr), brother-in-law of Mr Dombey, a stout gentleman, with a tendency to whistle and hum airs at inopportune moments. Mr Chick is somewhat hen-pecked, but in the matrimonial squall, though apparently beaten, he not infrequently rises up the superior and gets his own way.

Louisa Chick, Mr Dombey's married sister. She is of a snappish temper, but dresses in a most juvenile style, and is persuaded that anything can be accomplished if persons will only "make an effort"—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846).

Chicken (The), Michael Angelo Taylor, barrister, so called because in his maiden speech, 1785, he said, "I deliver this opinion with great deference, being but a chicken in the profession of the law."

Chicken (The Game), a low fellow, to be heard of at the bar of the Black Badger. Mr Toots selects this man as his instructor in fencing, betting, and self-defence. The Chicken has short hair, a low forehead, a broken nose, and "a considerable tract of bare and sterile country behind each ear"—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846).

Chickens and the Augurs. When the augurs told Publius Claudius Pulcher, the Roman consul, who was about to engage the Carthaginian fleet, that the sacred chickens would not eat, he roplied, "Then toss them into the sea, that they may drink"

Chick'enstalker (Mrs), a stout, bonny, kind-hearted woman, who keeps a general shop Tobv Veck, in his dream, imagines her married to Tugby, the porter of sir Joseph Bowley —C Dickens, The Chimes (1844)

Chick'weed (Conley, i.e. Nosey), the man who robbed himself. He was a licensed victualler on the point of failing, and gave out that he had been robbed of 327 guineas "by a tall man with a black patch over his eye." He was much pitted, and numerous subscriptions were made on his behalf. A detective was sent to examine into the "robbery," and Chickweed would cry out, "There he is!" and run after the "hypothetical thief" for a considerable distance, and then lose sight of him. This occurred over and over again, and at last the detective said to him, "I've found out who done this here robbery." "Have you?" said Chickweed. "Yes," says Spysers, "you done it yourself." And so he had —C Dickens, Oliver Twist, xxxi (1837)

Chiff'inch (Master Thomas), alias Will Smith, a friend of Richard Ganslesse (2 syl). The private emissary of Charles II. He was employed by the duke of Buckingham to carry off Alice Bridgenorth to Whitehall, but the captive escaped and married Julian Fervil.

Kate Chiff'inch, mistress of Thomas Chiff'inch —Sir W. Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.)

Chignon [Shin yōng], the French valet of Miss Alscrip "the heiress." A silly, affected, typical French valet-de-chambre —General Burgoyne, The Hennessy (1718)

Chil'rax, a merry old soldier, lieutenant to general Memnon, in Paphos — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Mad Lover (1617)

Child. The notes of this bank bear a marigold, because this flower was the trade-mark of "Blanchard and Child." The original "marigold" is still to be seen in the front office, with the motto Ainsi mon ame —See First London Directory, 1677

Child (The), Bettina, daughter of Maximiliane Brentano. So called from the title of her book, Goethe's Correspondence with a Child

Child of Nature (The), a play by Mrs Inchbald. Amantis is the "child of Nature." She was the daughter of Alberto, banished "by an unjust sentence," and during his exile he left his daughter under the charge of the marquis Almanza. Amantis was brought up in total ignorance of the world and the passion-principles which sway it, but felt grateful to her guardian, and soon discovered that what she called "gratitude" the world calls "love." Her father returned home rich, his sentence cancelled and his innocence allowed, just in time to give his daughter in marriage to his friend Almanza.

Child of the Cord. So the defendant was called by the judges of the Vehm-gericht, in Westphalia, because every one condemned by the tribunal was hanged to the branch of a tree.

Child-King. Shakespeare says, "Woe to that land that's governed by a child!" (Richard III act ii sc 3)

Woe to thee O land when thy king is a child! —Eccles x. 16

Childe Harold, a man sated with the world, who roams from place to place, to kill time and escape from himself. The "childe" is, in fact, lord Byron himself, who was only 21 when he began the poem, which was completed in seven years. In canto i the "childe" visits Portugal and Spain (1809), in canto ii Turkey in Europe (1813), in canto iii Belgium and Switzerland (1816), and in canto iv Venice, Rome, and Florence (1817).

Child'sers (E W B), one of the riders in Slear's circus, noted for his vaulting and reckless riding in the character of the "Wild Huntsman of the Prairies." This compound of groom and actor marries Josephine, Slear's daughter.

Kidderminster Childers, son of the above, known in the profession as "Cupie." He is a diminutive boy, with an old face and facetious manner wholly beyond his years —C Dickens, Hard Times (1854)

Children (The Henneberg). It is said that the countess of Henneberg railed at a beggar for having twins, and the hegger, turning on the countess, who was 42 years old, said, "May you have as many children as there are days in a year," and ture enough on Good Friday, 1276, the countess brought forth 335 at one birth, all the males were christened John and all the females Elizabeth. They were buried at a village near La Hague, and the jug is still shown in which they were baptized.

Children in the Wood, the little son (three years old) and younger daughter (Jane), left by a Norfolk gentleman on his death-bed to the care of his deceased wife's brother. The boy was to have £300 a year on coming of age, and the girl £200 as a wedding portion, but if the children died in their minority the money was to go to the uncle. The uncle, in order to secure the property, hired two ruffians to murder the children, but one of them relented and killed his companion, then, instead of murdering the babes, he left them in Wayland Wood, where they gathered blackberries, but died at night with cold and terror. All things went ill with the uncle, who perished in gaol, and the ruffian after a lapse of seven years confessed the whole villainy.—Percy, Reliques, III. ii. 18

Children of the Mist, one of the branches of the MacGregors, a wild race of Scotch Highlanders, who had a skirmish with the soldiers in pursuit of Dalgity and McLaugh among the rocks (ch. 14).—Sir W. Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.)

Chillon' (Prisoner of), François de Bonivard, of Lunès, the Genevise patriot (1499-1576), who opposed the enterprises of Charles III (the duke-bishop of Savoy) against the independence of Geneva, and was cast by him into the prison of Chillon, where he was confined for six years. Lord Byron makes him one of six brothers, two of whom died on the battle-field, one was burnt at the stake, and three were imprisoned at Chillon. Two of the prisoners died, but François was set at liberty by the people of Berne.—Byron, Prisoner of Chillon (1816).

Chil'minar', the city of "forty pillars," built by the genu for a luring-place to hide themselves in. Balac was also built by the genu.

Chimène (La Belle) or Ximèna, daughter of count Lozano de Gormaz, wife of the Cid. After the Cid's death she defended Valencia from the Moors with great bravery, but without success. Corneille and Guilhem de Castro have introduced her in their tragedies, but the role they represent her to have taken is wholly imaginary.

China, a corruption of Tsina, the territory of Tsin. The dynasty of Tsin (B.C. 276-221) takes the same position in Chinese history as that of the Nomans (founded by William the Conqueror) does in English history. The founder of the Tsin dynasty built the Great Wall, divided the empire into thirty-six provinces, and made roads or canals in every direction, so that virtually the empire begins with this dynasty.

Chinaman (Join), a man of China.

Chindasuin'tho (4 syl.) king of Spain, father of Theodoric, and grandfather of Roderick, last of the Gothic kings.—Southey Roderick, etc (1814).

Being set at liberty, Ernest marries the countess —L Stirling, The Prisoner of State (1847)

Christmas comes but Once a Year —Tusser, Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry (1557)

Christmas Day, called "the day of new clothes," from an old French custom of giving those who belonged to the court new cloaks on that day.

On Christmas Eve 1245 the king [Louis XI] bade all his court be present at early morning mass. At the chapel door each man received his new cloak, put it on, and went in. As the day rose each man saw on his neighbours' shoulder betokened the crusading vow —Hitchin, History of France 1 328.

Chris'topher (St), a saint of the Roman and Greek Churches, said to have lived in the third century. His pagan name was Offerus, his body was twelve ells in height, and he lived in the land of Canaan. Offerus made a vow to serve only the mightiest, so, thinking the emperor was "the mightiest," he entered his service. But one day the emperor crossed himself for fear of the devil, and the giant perceived that there was one mightier than his present master, so he quitted his service for that of the devil. After a while, Offerus discovered that the devil was afraid of the cross, whereupon he enlisted under Christ, employing himself in carrying pilgrims across a deep stream. One day, a very small child was carried across by him, but proved so heavy that Offerus, though a huge giant, was well-nigh borne down by the weight. This child was Jesus, who changed the giant's name to Christoferus, "bearer of Christ." He died three days afterwards, and was canonized.

Chronicle (The Saxon), an historical prose work in Anglo-Saxon, down to the reign of Henry II, a D 1154.

Chronicles (Anglo-Norman), a series of writers on British history in verse, of very early date. Geoffrey Gaimar wrote his Anglo-Norman chronicle before 1146. It is a history in verse of the Anglo-Saxon kings. Robert Wace wrote the Brut d'Angleterre [i.e. Chronicle of England] in eight-syllable verse, and presented his work to Henry II. It was begun in 1160, and finished in 1170.

Chronicles (Latin), historical writers of the eleventh and twelfth centuries.

Chronicles (Rhyming), a series of writers on English history, from the thirteenth century. The most noted are Layamon (called "The English Pannus") bishop of Hereford-upon-Severn (1216). Robert of Gloucester, who wrote a narrative of British history, from the landing of Brut to the close of the reign of Henry III (* to 1272). No date is assigned to the coming of Brut, but he was the son of Silvius Æneas (the third generation from Æneas, who escaped from Troy, B.C. 1183), so that the date may be assumed to be B.C. 1028, thus giving a scope of 2300 years to the chronicle. (The verse of this chronicle is eight and six syllables displayed together, so as to form lines of fourteen syllables each.) Robert de Brunne, whose chronicle is in two parts. The first ends with the death of Cadwallader, and the second with the death of Edward I. The earlier parts are similar to the Anglo-Norman chronicle of Wace. (The verse is octo-syllabic.)

Chronicles of Canongate, certain stories supposed to have been written by Mrs Martha Bethune Balhol, a lady of quality and fortune, who lived, when in Edinburgh, at Balhol Lodging, in the Canongate. These tales were written at the request of her cousin, Mr Croftangry, by whom, at her death, they were published. The first series contains The Highland Widow, The Two Drovers, and [The Surgeon's Daughter, afterwards removed from this series] The second series contains The Fair Maid of Perth—Sir W. Scott, "Chronicles of Canongate" (introduction of The Highland Widow)

Chionology (The Father of), J. J. Scaliger (1540-1609)

Chronon-Hoton-Thol'ogog (King) He strikes Bombardin'ian, general of his forces, for giving him hashed pork, and saying, "Kings as great as Chronon-hotonthologos have made a hearty meal on worse." The king calls his general a traitor. "Traitor in thy teeth," retorts the general. They fight, and the king dies.—H. Carey, Chrononhotonthologos (a burlesque, 1784)

Chrysalde' (2 syl), friend of Ar-nolphe—Molière, L'école des Femmes (1662)

Chrysale (2 syl), a simple-minded, hen-pecked French tradesman, whose wife Philaminte (3 syl) neglects her house for the learned languages, women's rights, and the aristocracy of mind. He is himself a plain practical man, who has no sympathy with the bas bleu movement. He has two daughters, Armande (2 syl) and Henriette, both of whom love Clitandre, but Armande, who is a "blue-stocking," loves him platonically, while Henriette, who is a "thorough woman," loves him with woman's love. Chrysale sides with his daughter Henriette, and when he falls into money difficulties through the "learned proclivities" of his wife, Clitandre comes forward like a man, and obtains the consent of both parents to his marriage with Henriette.—Molière, Les Femmes Savantes (1672)

Chrysa'or (ch = f), the sword of sir Ar'egal, which "exceeded all other swords." It once belonged to Jove, and was used by him against the Titans, but it had been laid aside till Astræa gave it to the Knight of Justice.

Of most perfect metal it was made
Tempered with adamant no substance was so hard

But it would pierce or cleave whereso'er it came
Spenser, Fairy Queen v (1633)

* * The poet tells us it was broken to pieces by Radigund queen of the Amazons (bk v 7), yet it re-appears whole and sound (canto 12), when it is used with good service against Grantorto (the spirit of rebellion). Spenser says it was called Chrysaor because "the blade was garnished all with gold."

Chrysa'or, son of Neptune and Medusa. He married Callirhoë (4 syl), one of the sea-nymphs.

Chrysaor rising out of the sea
Showed thus glorious and thus emulous,
Leaving the arms of Callirhoë
Longfellow The Evening Star

Chryseis [Χρυσείης], daughter of Chryse's priest of Apollo. She was famed for her beauty and her embroidery. During the Trojan war Chryseis was taken captive and allotted to Agamemnon king of Argos, but her father came to ransom her. The king would not accept the offered ransom, and Chryseis prayed that a plague might fall on the Grecian camp. His prayer was answered, and in order to avert the plague Agamemnon sent the lady back to her father not only without ransom but with costly gifts.—Homer, Iliad, i Chrysostom, a famous scholar, who died for love of Marcella, "rich William's daughter."

Untrilled in learning and wit he was sincere in disposition generous and magnificent without ostentation prudent and solicitous without affectation modest and complaisant without meanness. In a word one of the foremost in goodness of heart, and second to none in misfortunes.—Cervantes, Don Quixote I ll 5 (1605)

Chucks, the boatswain under captain Savage—Captain Marryat, Peter Simple (1833)

Chuffey, Anthony Chuzzlewit's old clerk, almost in his dotage, but master and man love each other with sincerest affection.

Chuffey fell back into a dark corner on one side of the fire place where he always spent his evenings and was neither seen nor heard save once when a cup of tea was given him in which he was seen to "work his bread mechanically." He remained as it were frozen up if any term expressive of such a vicarious process can be applied to him.—C. Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit xl (1843)

Chunée (À la), very huge and bulky. Chunee was the largest elephant ever brought to England. Henry Harris, manager of Covent Garden, bought it for £900 to appear in the pantomime of Harlequin Padmenaba, in 1810. It was subsequently sold to Cross, the proprietor of Exeter Change. Chunee at length became mad, and was shot by a detachment of the Guards, receiving 152 wounds. The skeleton is preserved in the museum of the College of Surgeons. It is 12 feet 1 inches high.

Church I go to church to hear God praised, not the King. This was the wise but severe rebuke of George III to Dr. Wilson, of St. Margaret's Church, London.

Church built by Voltaire Voltaire the atheist built at Ferney a (Christian) church, and had this inscription affixed to it, "Deo crevit Voltaire" Campbell, in the life of Cowper (vol vi 358), says "he knows not to whom Cowper alludes in these lines"

Nor his who for the bane of thousands born
Built God a church and laughed His Word to scorn.
Cowper Retirement (178-)

Church-of-Englandism This word was the coinage of Jeremy Bentham (1748-1832)

Chuz'zlewit (Anthony), cousin of Martin Chuzzlewit the grandfather Anthony is an avaricious old hunk, proud of having brought up his son Jonas to be as mean and grasping as himself. His two redeeming points are his affection for his old servant Chuffey, and his forgiveness of Jonas after his attempt to poison him.

The old-established firm of Anthony Chuzzlewit and Son, Manchester warehousemen, had its place of business in a very narrow street somewhere behind the Post Office. A dim dirty smoky tumble-down rotten old house it was, but here the firm transacted their business, and neither the young man nor the old one had any other residence.—Chap. xi.

Jonas Chuzzlewit, son of Anthony, of the "firm of Anthony Chuzzlewit and Son, Manchester warehousemen." A consummate villain of mean brutality and small tyranny. He attempts to poison his old father, and murders Montague Tigg, who knows his secret. Jonas marries Mersey Pecksniff, his cousin, and leads her a life of utter misery. His education had been conducted on money-grubbing principles, the first word he was taught to spell was gain, and the second money. He poisons himself to save his neck from the gallows.

This fine young man had all the inclination of a profligate of the first water and only lacked the one good trait in the common catalogue of debauched vices—open handedness—to be a notable vagabond. But there is gripping and penurious habits stepped in.—Chap. xl.

Martin Chuzzlewit, sen, grandfather to the hero of the same name. A stern old man, whose kind heart has been turned to gall by the dire selfishness of his relations. Being resolved to expose Pecksniff, he goes to live in his house, and pretends to be weak in intellect, but keeps his eyes sharp open, and is able to expose the canting scoundrel in all his deformities.

Martin Chuzzlewit, jun, the hero of the tale called Martin Chuzzlewit, grandson to old Martin. His nature has been warped by bad training, and at first he is both selfish and exacting, but the troubles and hardships he undergoes in "Lden" completely transform him, and he becomes worthy of Mary Graham, whom he marries—C Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1841)

Chyndo'nax, a chief druid, whose tomb (with a Greek inscription) was discovered near Dijon, in 1598.

Ciacco (2 syl), a glutton, spoken to by Dante, in the third circle of hell, the place to which gluttons are consigned to endless woe. The word means "a pig," and is not a proper name, but only a symbolical one—Dante, Hell, vi (1300)

Ciacco thy dire affliction grieves me much Hell vi.

Cicero When the great Roman orator was given up by Augustus to the revenge of Antony, it was a cobbler who conducted the secret to Fornure, whither Cicero had fled in a litter, intending to put to sea. His bearers would have fought, but Cicero forbade them, and one Popilius [Lænas] has the unenviable notoriety of being his murderer.

It was a cobbler that set the murderers on Cicero—
Ovid's Tristia i. 6.

Cicero of the British Senate, George Canning (1770-1827)

Cicero of France, Jean Baptiste Massillon (1663-1742)

Cicero of Germany, John elector of Brandenburg (1455, 1486-1499)

The British Cicero, William Pitt, earl of Chatham (1708-1778)

The Christian Cicero, Lælius Cælius Lactantius (died 330)

The German Cicero, Johann Sturm, printer and scholar (1507-1589)

Cicle'nus So Chaucer calls Mercury. He was named Cylle'nus from mount Cylle'n, in Peloponnesus, where he was born.

Cid (The) = Seid or Signior, also called Campeador [Cam pa' dor] or "Camp hero." Rodrigue Diaz de Bivar was surnamed "the Cid." The great hero of Castille, he was born at Burgos 1030 and died 1099. He signalized himself by his exploits in the reigns of Ferdinand, Sancho II, and Alphonso VI of Leon and Castille. In the wars between Sancho II and his brother (Alphonso VI), he sided with the former, and on the assassination of Sancho, was disgraced, and quitted the court. He then assembled his vassals, and marched against the Moors, whom he conquered in several battles, so that Alphonso was necessitated to recall him. Both Corneille and Guilhem de Cantre have admirable tragedies on the subject, Ross Neil has an English drama called The Cid, Sanchez, in 1775, wrote a long poem of 1128 verses, called Poema del Cid Campeador. Southey, in his Chronicle of the Cid (1808), has collected all that is known of this extraordinary hero.

(It was The Cid (1636) which gained for Corneille the title of "Le Grand Corneille")

The Cid's Father, don Diego Lainez

The Cid's Mother, doña Teresa Nuñez

The Cid's Wife, Xime'na, daughter of count Lozano de Gormaz. The French call her La Belle Chumene, but the role ascribed to her by Corneille is wholly imaginary.

Never more to thine own castle
Wilt thou turn Babieca's rein
Never wilt thy loved Ximena
See thee at her side again.

The Cid

The Cid's Children. His two daughters were Elvira and Sol, his son Diego Rodriguez died young.

The Cid's Horse was Babieca (either Bab'elch or Bab'elch). It survived its master two years and a half, but no one was allowed to mount it. Babieca was buried before the monastery gates of Valencia, and two elms were planted to mark the spot.

Troth it goodly was and pleasant
To behold him at their head,
All in mail on Babieca,
And to list the words he said.

The Cid

(Here "Babieca" is 4 syl, but in the verse above it is only 3 syl.)

The Cid's Swords, Cola'da and Tizo'na ("terror of the world"). The latter was taken by him from king Bencar.

Cid (The Portuguese), Nunez Alva'rez Pereira (1360-1431).

Cid Hamet Benengeli, the hypothetical author of Don Quixote. (See BENE'GELI.)

Spanish commentators have discovered this pseudonym to be only an Arabian version of Signior Cervantes Cid, i.e. "signior," Hamet, a Moorish prefix; and Ben-en-geli, meaning "son of a stag." So cervato ("a young stag") is the basis of the name Cervantes.

Cid'li, the daughter of Jairus, restored to life by Jesus. She was beloved by Sem'ida, the young man of Nain, also raised by Jesus from the dead.—Klopstock, The Messiah, iv (1771).

Cyllaros, the horse of Crator or Pollux, so named from Cylla, in Troas.

Cimmerian Darkness. Homer places the Cimmerians beyond the Oceanus, in a land of never-ending gloom, and immediately after Cimmeria, he places the empire of Hades. Pliny (Historia Naturalis, vi 14) places Cimmeria near the lake Avernus, in Italy, where "the sun never penetrates." Cimmeria is now called Kertch, but the Cossacks call it Prehla (Hell).

There under ebon shades and low browed necks
In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell

Milton L 477 (1633)

Ye spectre-doubts that roll

Cimmerian darkness on the parting soul

Cinenna'tus of the Americans, George Washington (1732-1799).

Cinderella, the heroine of a fairy tale. She was the drudge of the house, "put upon" by her two elder sisters. While the elder sisters were at a ball, a fairy came, and having arrayed the "little cinder-girl" in ball costume, sent her in a magnificent coach to the palace where the ball was given. The prince fell in love with her, but knew not who she was. Thus, however, he discovered by means of a "glass slipper" which she dropped, and which fitted no foot but her own.

(This tale is substantially the same as that of Rhodopis and Psammitichus in Ælian (Var Hist, xiii 32). A similar one is also told in Strabo (Geog xvii).)

The glass slipper should be the fur slipper, pantoufle en vair, not en verre, our version being taken from the Contes de fées of C. Perrault (1697).

Cinna, a tragedy by Pierre Corneille (1637). Mlle Rachel, in 1838, took the chief female character, and produced a great sensation in Paris.

Cinq-Mars (II Coiffier de Ruzé, marquis de), favourite of Louis XIII and protégé of Richelieu (1620-1612). Irritated by the cardinal's opposition to his marriage with Marie de Gonzague, Cinq-Mars tried to overthrow or to assassinate him. Gaston, the king's brother, sided with the conspirator, but Richelieu discovered the plot, and Cinq-Mars, being arrested, was condemned to death. Alfred de Vigny published, in 1826, a novel (in imitation of Scott's historical novels) on the subject, under the title of Cinq-Mars.

Cinquecento (3 syl), the fiftieth century of Italian notables. They were Ariosto (1474-1533), Tasso (1544-1595), and Giovanni Rucellai (1475-1526), poets, Raphael (1483-1520), Titian (1480-1576), and Michael Angelo (1474-1564), painters. These, with Machiavelli, Luigi Alamanni, Bernardo Baldi, etc., make up what is termed the "Cinquecentisti." The word means the worthies of the 500 epoch, and it will be observed that they all flourished between 1500 and the close of that century (See SEICENTA, and p 1024).

Ovid writes in winter mornings at a Venetian writing table of cinquecento work that would enrapture the souls of the virtuous who haunt Christie's.—E. Yates, Celebrities xix.

Cipan'go or Zipango, a marvelous island described in the Voyages of Marco Polo, the Venetian traveller. He described it as lying some 1500 miles from land. This island was an object of diligent search by Columbus and other early navigators, but belongs to that wonderful chart which contains the Li Doardo of sir Walter Raleigh, the Utopia of sir Thomas More, the Atlantis of lord Bacon, the Laputa of dean Swift, and other places better known in story than in geography.

Cipher. The Rev R Fegerton Warburton, being asked for his cipher by a lady, in 1845, wrote back

Circumlocution Office, a term applied by C Dickens, in Little Dorrit (1855), to our public offices, where the duty is so divided and subdivided that the simplest process has to pass through a whole series of officials. The following, from baron Stockmar, will illustrate the absurdity—

In the English palace the lord steward finds the fuel and lays the fire but the lord chamberlain lights it. The baron says he was once sent by the queen (Victoria) to sir Frederick Watson (master of the household) to complain that the ———— Mr Frederick replied lord steward who lights it.

Again he says

The lord chamberlain provides the lamps but the lord steward has to see that they are trimmed and lighted

Here, therefore, the duty is reversed
Again

If a pane of glass or the door of a cupboard in the kitchen needs mending the process is as follows (1) A

It must next be authorized at the lord chamberlain's office. (5) Being thus authorized it is laid before the clerk of the works under the office of Woods and Forests. So that it would take months before the pane of glass or cupboard could be mended.—Memoirs ii 121 12

Akenside Hymn to the Mæads (1767)

Cis'ley or Ciss, an dairy-maid. Tusser frequently speaks of the "dairy-maid Cisley," and in April Husbandry tells Ciss she must carefully keep these ten guests from her cheeses: Gehazi, Lot's wife, Argus, Tom Piper, Crispin, Lazarus, Esau, Mary Maudlin, Gentiles, and bishops. (1) Gehazi, because a cheese should never be a dead white, like Gehazi the leper. (2) Lot's wife, because a cheese should not be too salt, like Lot's wife. (3) Argus, because a cheese should not be full of eyes, like Argus. (4) Tom Piper, because a cheese should not be "hoven and puffed," like the cheeks of a piper. (5) Crispin, because a cheese should not be lenthery, as if for a cobbler's use. (6) Lazarus, because a cheese should not be poor, like the beggar Lazarus. (7) Esau, because a cheese should not be hairy, like Esau. (8) Mary Maudlin, because a cheese should not be full of whey, as Mary Maudlin was full of tears. (9) Gentiles, because a cheese should not be full of maggots or gentils. (10) Bishops, because a cheese should not be made of burnt milk, or milk "banned by a bishop"—T Tusser, Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry ("April," 1557).

Claypole (Loah), alias "Mornia Bolter," an ill-conditioned charity-borg, who takes down the shutters of Sowerberrys snop and receives broken meats from Charlotte (Sowerberrys servant), whom he afterwards marries—C. Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Cleante (2 syl), brother-in-law of Orgon. He is distinguished for his genuine piety, and is both high-minded and compassionate — Moliere, La Tartuffe (1664)

Cleante (2 syl), son of Harpagon the miser, in love with Mariane (3 syl). Harpagon, though 60 years old, wished to marry the same young lady, but Cleante solved the difficulty thus. He dug up a casket of gold from the garden, hidden under a tree by the miser, and while Harpagon was raving about the loss of his gold, Cleante told him he might take his choice between Mariane and the gold. The miser preferred the casket, which was restored to him, and Cleante married Mariane — Moliere, L'Avare (1667)

Cleante (2 syl), the lover of Angelique daughter of Argan the malade imaginaire. As Argan had promised Angelique in marriage to Thomas Diafoirus a young surgeon, Cleante carries on his love as a music-master, and though Argan is present, the lovers sing to each other their plans under the guise of an interlude called "Tircis and Philis". Ultimately, Argan assents to the marriage of his daughter with Cleante — Moliere, Le Malade Imaginaire (1673)

Cleante (2 syl), sister of Siphax of Paphos — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Mad Lover (1617)

Cleante (3 syl), the lady beloved by Ion — Talfourd, Ion (1835)

Cleante (3 syl), son of Leonidas and husband of Hippolyta, noted for his filial piety. The duke of Lure made a law that all men who had attained the age of 80 should be put to death as useless incumbrances of the commonwealth. Simonides, a young libertine, admired the law, but Cleante looked on it with horror, and determined to save his father from its operation. Accordingly, he gave out that his father was dead, and an ostentatious funeral took place, but Cleante retired to a wood, where he concealed Leonidas, while he and his wife waited on him and administered to his wants — The Old Law (a comedy of Philip Massinger, T Middleton, and W Rowley, 1620)

Clogg (Holdfast), a punster millwright — Sir W Scott, Peck of the Peal (time, Charles II)

Cleishbotham (Jed h'ah), schoolmaster and parish clerk of Gundertleuch, who employed his assistant teacher to arrange and edit the tales told by the landlord of the Wallace inn of the same parish. These tales the editor disposed in three series, called by the general title of The Tales of My Landlord (q v). (See introduction of The Black Dwarf). Of course the real author is Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832)

Mrs Dorotha Cleishbotham, wife of the schoolmaster, a perfect Xantippe, and "sworn sister of the Lumenides"

Clelia or Clodia, a Roman maiden, one of the hostages given to Porcina. She made her escape from the Etruscan camp by swimming across the Tiber. Being sent back by the Romans, Porcina not only set her at liberty for her gallant deed, but allowed her to take with her a part of the hostages. Mlle Scuderi has a novel on the subject, entitled Clelie, Histoire Romaine

Clelia, a vain, frivolous female butterfly, with a smattering of everything. In youth she was a coquette, and when youth was passed, tried sundry means to earn a living, but without success — Crabbe, Borough (1810)

Clélie (2 syl), the heroine of a novel so called by Mlle Scuderi. (See Clelia)

Clement, one of the attendants of Sir Reginald Front de Bauf (a follower of prince John) — Sir W Scott, Jeanie (time, Richard I)

Clement (Justice), a man quite able to discern between sin and crime. Although he had the weakness "of justice justice," he had not the weakness of ignorant vulgarity.

Knottell. They say he will commit a man for taking the wall of his horse.

Wellard. Ay, or for wearing his cloak on one shoulder or serving God. Anything indeed if it comes in the way of his humour — W Jones, Every Man in His Humour III 2 (1675)

Clementina (The lady), an amiable, delicate, beautiful, accomplished, but unfortunate woman, deeply in love with Sir Charles Grandison. Sir Charles married Harriet Byron — S Richardson, The History of Sir Charles Grandison (1753)

The scenes relating to the history of Clementina contain passages of deep pathos — Ancient Brit. Art. Reading.

Shakespeare himself has scarcely drawn a more affecting or harrowing picture of high souled suffering and blighting calamity than the madness of Clementina.—

Chambers, English Literature II. 161.

Cle'ofas (Don), the hero of a novel by Lesage, entitled Le Diable Boiteux (The Devil on Two Sticks). A fiery young Spaniard, proud, high-spirited, and revengeful, noted for gallantry, but not without generous sentiments. Asmodeus (4 syl) shows him what is going on in private families by unroofing the houses (1707).

Cleom'brotus or Ambracio'ta of Ambracia (in Epirus). Having read Plato's book on the soul's immortality and happiness in another life, he was so ravished with the description that he leaped into the sea that he might die and enjoy Plato's elysium.

Milton Paradise Lost III. 47 etc. (1665)

Cleom'enes (4 syl), the hero and title of a drama by Dryden (1692).

As Dryden came out of the theatre a young top of fashion said to him: "If I had been left alone with a young beauty I would not have spent my time like your Spartan hero." "Perhaps not," said the poet, "but you are not my hero"—W. C. Russell, Representative Actors.

Cleom'enes (4 syl) "The Venus of Cleomenēs" is now called "The Venus di Medici."

Such a mere moist lump was once the Venus of Cleomenēs—Ovid, Artamē, l. 8.

Cle'on, governor of Tarsus, burnt to death with his wife Dionys'ia by the enraged citizens, to revenge the supposed murder of Mari'na, daughter of Pericles prince of Tyre—Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Cle'on, the personification of glory—
Spenser, Faery Queen.

Cleop'atra, queen of Egypt, wife of Ptolemy Dionysius her brother. She was driven from her throne, but re-established by Julius Cæsar, B.C. 47. Antony, captivated by her, repudiated his wife, Octavia, to live with the fascinating Egyptian. After the loss of the battle of Actium, Cleopatra killed herself by an asp.

E. Jodelle wrote in French a tragedy called Cleopâtre Captive (1530), Jean Mairet one called Cleopâtre (1630), Isaac de Benzerade (1670), J. F. Marmontel (1750), and Mde de Girardin (1847) wrote tragedies in French on the same subject. S. Daniel (1600) wrote a tragedy in English called Cleopatra, Shakespeare one called Antony and Cleopatra (1608), and Dryden one on the same subject, called All for Love or The World Well Lost (1682).

* * Mrs. Oldfield (1683-1730) and Peg [Margaret] Woffington (1718-1760] were unrivalled in this character.

Cleopatra and the Pearl. The tale is that Cleopatra made a sumptuous banquet, which excited the surprise of Antony, whereupon the queen took a pearl ear-drop, dissolved it in a strong acid, and drank the liquor to the health of the triumvir, saying, "My draught to Antony shall exceed in value the whole banquet."

* * When queen Elizabeth visited the Exchange, sir Thomas Gresham pledged her health in a cup of wine containing a precious stone crushed to atoms, and worth £15,000.

Here £15,000 at one clap goes
Instead of sugar Gresham drinks the pearl
Unto his queen and mistress. Pledge it forth,
Th. Heywood If You Know no. Me You Know Nobody

Cleopatra in Hades. Cleopatra, says Rabelais, is "a erier of onions" in the shades below. The Latin for a pearl and onion is unio, and the pun refers to Cleopatra giving her pearl (or onion) to Antony in a draught of wine, or, as some say, drinking it herself in toasting her lover—Rabelais, Pantagruel, II. 30 (1533).

Cleop'atra, queen of Syria, daughter of Ptolemy Philometer king of Egypt. She first married Alexander Bala, the usurper (B.C. 149), next Demetrius Nicanor Demetrius, being taken prisoner by the Parthians, married Rodogune (3 syl), daughter of Phraates (3 syl) the Parthian king, and Cleopatra married Antiochus Sidetes, brother of Demetrius. She slew her son Seleucus (by Demetrius) for treason, and as this produced a revolt, abdicated in favour of her second son, Antiochus VIII, who compelled her to drink poison which she had prepared for herself. P. Corneille has made this the subject of his tragedy called Rodogune (1646).

* * This is not the Cleopatra of Shakespeare and Dryden's tragedies.

Cleremont (2 syl), a merry gentleman, the friend of Dinant—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Little French Lawyer (1647).

Clerimond, niece of the Green Knight, sister of Fer'ragus the giant, and bride of Valentine the brave—Valentine and Orson.

Clerks (St Nicholas's), there, also called "St Nicholas's Clergymen," in allusion to the tradition of "St Nicholas and the thieves." Probably a play on the words Nich-olas and Old Nick may be designed—See Shakespeare, 1 Henry IV act ii sc 1 (1597)

Gless'ammor, son of Thaddu and brother of Morna (Fingal's mother). He married Moira, daughter of Reuth'mur (the principal man of Balcutha, on the Clyde). It so happened that Moira was beloved by a Briton named Reuda, who came with an army to carry her off. Reuda was slain by Gless'ammor, but Gless'ammor, being closely pressed by the Britons, fled, and never again saw his bride. In due time a son was born, called Carthon, but the mother died. While Carthon was still an infant Iingul's father attacked Balcutha, and slew Reuth'mur (Carthon's grandfather). When the boy grew to manhood, he determined on vengeance, accordingly he invaded Morven, the kingdom of Iingal, where Gless'ammor, not knowing who he was, engaged him in single combat, and slew him. When he discovered that it was his son, three days he mourned for him, and on the fourth he died—Ossian, Carthon.

Cleveland (Barbara Villiers, duchess of), one of the mistresses of Charles II, introduced by sir W. Scott in Peveril of the Peak.

Cleveland (Captain Clement), alias Vulcan [Jawn], "the pirate," son of Norna of the Fitful Head. He is in love with Minna Troil (daughter of Magnus Troil, the udaller of Zetland)—Sir W. Scott, The Pirate (time, William III.)

Clover, the man-servant of Hero Sutton "the city maiden." When Hero resumed the guise of a quaker, Clover called himself Obadiah, and pretended to be a rigid quaker also. His constant exclamation was "Umph!"—S. Knowles, Woman's Wit, etc (1858).

Clifford (Sir Thomas), betrothed to Julia (daughter of Master Walter "the hunchback"). He is wise, honest, truthful, and well-favoured, kind, valiant, and prudent—S. Knowles, The Hunchback (1831).

Clifford (Mr), the heir of sir William Charlton in right of his mother, and in love with lady Emily Gavielle. The scrivener Alscrip had fraudulently got possession of the deeds of the Charlton estates, which he had given to his daughter called "the heiress," and which amounted to £2000 a year, but rightly, the lawyer, discovered the fraud, and "the heiress" was compelled to relinquish this part of her fortune. Clifford then proposed to lady Emily, and was accepted—General Burgovne, The Heiress (1781).

Clifford (Paul), a highwayman, reformed by the power of love—Lord Lytton, Paul Clifford (1830).

Clifford (Rosamond), usually called "The Fair Rosamond," the favourite mistress of Henry II, daughter of Walter lord Clifford. She is introduced by sir W. Scott in two novels, The Talisman and Woodstock. Dryden says

Jane Clifford was her name as books aver Fair Rosamond was but her name de guerre
Epilogue to Henry II

Clifford (Henry lord), a general in the English army—Sir W. Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I).

Clifford Street (London), so named from Elizabeth Clifford, daughter of the last earl of Cumberland, who married Richard Boyle, earl of Burlington (See SAVILE ROW).

Clifton (Harry), lieutenant of H. V. ship Tiger. A daring, dashing, care-for-nobody young English sailor, delighting in adventure, and loving a good scrape. He and his companion Mat Miven take the side of H. Hyder, and help to re-establish the Chereddin, prince of Delhi, who had been dethroned by Hamet Abdulerim—Barrymore, Li Hyder, Chief of the Ghaut Mountains.

Clm of the Clough (See CLIM).

Clmk (Jem), the turnkey at Newgate—Sir W. Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Clinker (Humphry), a poor workhouse lad, put out by the parish as apprentice to a blacksmith, and afterwards employed as an ostler's assistant and extra position. Being dismissed from the stables, he enters the service of Mr Bramble, a fretful, grumpy, but kind-hearted and generous old gentleman, greatly troubled with gout. Here he falls in love with Winifred Jenkins, Miss Tabitha Bramble's maid, and turns out to be a natural son of Mr Bramble—T. Smollett, The Expedition of Humphry Clinker (1771).

(Probably this novel suggested to C. Dickens his Adventures of Oliver Twist.)

Clio, an anagram of C[helsea], L[ondon], I[shington], O[ffice], the places from which Addison despatched his papers for the Spectator. The papers signed by any of these letters are by Addison, hence called "Clio"

When panting virtue her last efforts made
You brought your Clio to the virgin's aid
Somerville

Clip'puse (Lawyer), the lawyer employed by sir Everard Waverley to make his will—Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Cluquot [Klee' lo], a nickname given by Punch to Frederick William IV of Prussia, from his love of champagne of the "Cluquot brand" (1795, 1810-1861)

Clitandre, a wealthy bourgeois, in love with Henriette, "the thorough woman," by whom he is beloved with fervent affection. Her elder sister Armande (2 syl) also loves him, but her love is of the Platonic hue, and Clitandre prefers in a wife the warmth of woman's love to the marble of philosophic idealism—Molière, Les Femmes Savantes (1672)

Cloacina, the presiding personification of city sewers (Latin, cloaca, "a sewer")

Cloacina, goddess of the tide
Whose sable streams beneath the city glide
Gay Trivia II. (1712)

Clod'dipole (3 syl), "the wisest lout of all the neighbouring plain" Appointed to decide the contention between Cudda and Lobbin Clout

From Cloddipole we learn to read the skies
To know when hail will fall or winds arise
He taught us erst the helter's tall to view
When struck aloft that showers would straight ensue
He first that a eul secret did explain
That prickling corns foretell the gathering rain
When swallows fleet, our high and sport in air
He told us that the welkin would be clear Gay Pastoral I (1714)

(Cloddipole is the "Palemon" of Virgil's Ecl III)

Clo'dio (Count), governor. A dishonourable pursuer of Zeno'ra, the chaste troth-plight wife of Arnol'do—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Custom of the Country (1647)

Clodio, the youngerson of don Antonio, a cockcomb and braggart. Always boasting of his great acquaintances, his conquests, and his duels. His snuff-box he thinks more of than his lady-love, he interlards his speech with French, and exclaims "Split me!" by way of oath. Clodio was to have married Angelina, but the lady preferred his elder brother

Carlos, a bookworm, and Clodio engaged himself to Elvira of Lisbon—C Cibber, Love Makes a Man (1691)

Clo'e, in love with the shepherd Thenot, but Thenot rejects her suit out of admiration of the constancy of Clorinda for her dead lover. She is wretched, coarse, and immodest, the very reverse of Clorinda, who is a virtuous, chaste, and faithful shepherdess ("Thenot," the final t is sounded)—John Fletcher, The Faithful Shepherdess (1610) (See CHLOE)

Clo'ra, sister to Enbri'tio the merry soldier, and the sprightly companion of Frances (sister to Frederick)—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Captain (1613)

Clorinda'no, a humble Moorish youth, who joined Medo'ro in seeking the body of king Dardinello to bury it. Medoro being wounded, Clorinda rushed madly into the ranks of the enemy and was slain—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Clorinda, daughter of Senapius of Ethiopia (a Christian). Being born white, her mother changed her for a black child. The eunuch Arse'tes (3 syl) was entrusted with the infant Clorinda, and as he was going through a forest, saw a tiger, dropped the child, and sought safety in a tree. The tiger took the babe and suckled it, after which the eunuch carried the child to Egypt. In the siege of Jerusalem by the crusaders, Clorinda was a leader of the pagan forces. Tattered fell in love with her, but slew her unknowingly in a night attack. Before she expired she received Christian baptism at the hands of Ianered, who greatly mourned her death—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, III (1673)

(The story of Clorinda is borrowed from the Theag'anes and Charicle'a of Heliodorus bishop of Tric'ra)

Clorinda, "the faithful shepherdess," called "The Virgin of the Grove," faithful to her burned love. From this beautiful character, Milton has drawn his "lady" in Comus. Compare the words of the "First Brother" about easiness, in Milton's Comus, with these lines of Clorinda

Yet I have heard (my mother told it me)
And now I do believe it, if I keep

Or voices calling, me in deed of night
To make me follow, and so tell me on Through mire and standing pools, to find my rule.
Sure there's a power

In that great name of Virgin that binds fast
All rude uncivil bloods. Then strong Chastity
Be thou my strongest guard.
J. Fletcher The Faithful Shepherdess (1610)

Cloris, the damsel beloved by prince Prettyman—Duke of Buckingham, The Rehearsal (1671)

Clotaire (2 syl) The king of France exclaimed on his death-bed, "Oh how great must be the King of Heaven, if He can kill so mighty a monarch as I am!"
—Gregory of Tours, iv 21

Cloten or Cloton, king of Cornwall, one of the five kings of Britain after the extinction of the line of Brute
(1 syl) —Geoffrey, British History, ii 17
(1112)

Cloten, a vindictive lout, son of the second wife of Cymbeline by a former husband. He is noted for "his unmeaning frown, his shuffling gait, his burst of voice, his bustling insignificance, his fever-and-ague fits of valour, his froward tetchiness, his unprincipled malice, and occasional gleams of good sense." Cloten is the rejected lover of Imogen (the daughter of his father-in-law by his first wife), and is slain in a duel by Guiderius —Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605)

Clotharius or Clorinire, leader of the Franks after the death of Hugo. He is shot with an arrow by Clorinda—
Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, xi (1675)

Cloud A dark spot on the forehead of a horse between the eyes is so called.
It gives the creature a sour look indicative of ill-temper, and is therefore regarded as a blemish.

Antipyr He [Antony] has a cloud in his face

Cloud (St), patron saint of nail-smiths.
A play on the French word clou ("a nail")

Cloudesley (William of), a famous North-country archer, the companion of Adam Bell and Clym of the Clough.
Their feats of robbery were chiefly carried on in Inglewood Forest, near Carlisle.
William was taken prisoner at Carlisle, and was about to be hanged, but was rescued by his two companions. The three then went to London to ask pardon of the king, which at the queen's intercession was granted. The king begged to see specimens of their skill in archery, and was so delighted therewith, that he made William a "gentleman of fee," and the other two "yeomen of his chamber."

The feat of William was very similar to that of William Tell (qv).—Percy, Reliques, I ii 1

Clout (Colin), a shepherd loved by Marian "the parson's maid," but for whom Colin (who loved Cicely) felt no affection. (See COLIN CLOUT)

Young Colin Clout, a lad of peerless meed
Iull well could dance and deftly tune the reed
In every wood his carols sweet were known
At every wike his nimble feats were shown
Gay Pastoral II (1714)

Clout (Lobbin), a shepherd, in love with Blouzelinda. He challenged Cuddy to a contest of song in praise of their respective sweethearts, and Cloddipole was appointed umpire. Cloddipole was unable to award the prize, for each merited "an oaken staff for his pains." "Have done, however, for the herds are weary of the songs, and so am I"—Gay, Pastoral, i (1714)

(An imitation of Virgil's Ecl iii)

Club-Bearer (The), Periphetes, the robber of Argolis, who murdered his victims with an iron club—Greek Fable

Clumsy (Sir Tunbilly), father of Miss Hoyerden. A mean, ill-mannered squire and justice of the peace, living near Scarborough. Most cringing to the aristocracy, whom he toadies and courts, Sir Tunbilly promised to give his daughter in marriage to Lord Loppington, but Lord Fashion, his lordship's younger brother, pretends to be Lord Loppington, gains admission to the family, and marries her. When the real Lord Loppington arrives, he is treated as an impostor, but Lord Fashion confesses the ruse. His lordship treats the knight with such ineffable contempt, that Sir Tunbilly's temper is aroused, and Lord Fashion is received into high favour—Sheridan, A Trip to Scarborough
(1777)

 This character appears in Van-brugh's Relapse, of which comedy the Trip to Scarborough is an abridgment and adaptation.

Clumsey, the name of Belgride's dog

Cluricaune (3 syl), an Irish elf of evil disposition, especially noted for his knowledge of hid treasure. He generally assumes the appearance of a wrinkled old man.

Clutha, the Clyde towers. The winds had roared behind my sail, and Clutha's stream received my dark bosomed ship—Ossian

Carleton

Clutterbuck (Captain), the hypothetical editor of some of sir Walter Scott's novels, as The Monastery and The Fortunes of Nigel. Captain Clutterbuck is a retired officer, who employs himself in antiquarian researches and literary idleness. The Abbot is dedicated by the "author of Waterley" to "captain Clutterbuck," late of his majesty's — infantry regiment.

Clym of the Clough ("Clement of the Cliff"), a noted outlaw, associated with Adam Bell and William of Cloudesley, in Englewood Forest, near Carlisle. When William was taken prisoner at Carlisle, and was about to be hanged, Adam and Clym shot the magistrates, and rescued their companion. The mayor with his posse went out against them, but they shot the mayor, as they had done the sheriff, and fought their way out of the town. They then hastened to London to beg pardon of the king, which was granted them at the queen's intercession. The king, wishing to see a specimen of their shooting, was so delighted at their skill that he made William a "gentleman of fee," and the other two "vemen of his chambre"—Percy, Leuques ("Adam Bell," etc., I ii 1).

Clytie, a water-nymph, in love with Apollo. Meeting with no return, she was changed into a sunflower, or rather a tournesol, which still turns to the sun, following him through his daily course.

The sunflower does not turn to the sun. On the same stem may be seen flowers in every direction, and not one of them shifts the direction in which it has first opened. T. Moore (1814) says

The sunflower turns on her god when he's
The same look which she turned when he rose.

This may do in poetry, but it is not correct. The sunflower is so called simply because the flower resembles a picture sun.

Lord Tennyson (1821) adopted Tom Moore's error, and enlarged it

Behold my dear this lofty flower
That now the golden sun receives
No other deity his power
But only Phoebus, on her leaves
As he in radiant glory burns,
From east to west her visage turns.
The Sunflower

Clytus, an old officer in the army of Philip of Macedon, and subsequently in that of Alexander. At a banquet, when both were heated with wine, Clytus said to Alexander, "Philip fought men, but Alexander women," and after some other insults, Alexander in his rage stabbed the old soldier, but instantly repented and said

What has my vengeance done?
Who! It thou hast slain? Clytus! What was he
The faithfullest subject, worthiest counsellor
The bravest soldier. He who saved my life
Fighting bare-headed at the river Granic.
For a rash word spoke in the heat of wine
The poor the honest Clytus thou hast slain —
Clytus thy friend, thy guardian, thy preserver
N. Lee Alexander the Great iv 2 (1678)

Cne'us, the Roman officer in command of the guard set to watch the tomb of Jesus, lest the disciples should steal the body, and then declare that it had risen from the dead—Klopstock, The Messiah, xiii (1771).

Coaches, says Stow, in his Chronicle, were introduced by Fitz-Allen, earl of Arundel, in 1280.

Before the costly coach and silken stock came in.

Coals. To carry coals, to put up with affronts. The boy says in Henry V (act iii sc 2), "I knew the men would carry coals." So in Romeo and Juliet (act i sc 1), "Gregory, o' my word, we'll not carry coals." Ben Jonson, in Every Man out of His Humour says "Here comes one that will carry coals, ergo, will hold my dog."

The time hath been when I would a scorned to carry coal.—E. Troubles of Queen Elizabeth (1632)

(To carry corn, is to bear wealth, to be rich. He does not carry corn well, "He does not deport himself well in his prosperity.")

Co'an (The), Hippocrates, the "Father of Medicine" (B.C. 460–367).

the great Coan him whom Nature made
To serve the costliest creature of her tribe (man).
Dante, Purgatory xxix. (1306)

Co'anocot'zin (5 syl.), king of the Aztecas. Slain in battle by Madoc.—Sonthey, Madoc (1805).

Co'atel, daughter of Acul'hua, a priest of the Aztecas, and wife of Lincoya. Lincoya, being doomed for sacrifice, fled for refuge to Madoc, the Welsh prince, who had recently landed on the North American coast, and was kindly entreated by him. This gave Coate' a sympathetic interest in the White strangers, and she was not backward in showing it. Thus, when young Hoel was kidnapped, and confined in a cavern to starve to death, Coatel visited him and took him food. Again, when prince Madoc was entrapped, she contrived to release him, and assisted the prince to carry off young Hoel. After the defeat of the Aztecas by the White strangers, the chief priest declared that some one had proved a traitor, and resolved to discover who it was by handing round a cup, which he said would be harmless to the innocent, but death to the guilty. When it was handed to Coatli, she was so frightened that she dropped down dead. Her father stabbed his self, and "fell upon his child," and when Lineoya heard thereof, he flung himself down from a steep precipice on to the rocks below.—Southey, Madoc (1805)

Cobb (Ephraim), in Cromwell's troop.—Sir W. Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Cobbler-Poet (The), Hans Sachs of Nuremberg (See Twelve Wise Masters)

Cobham (Eleanor), wife of Humphrey duke of Gloucester, and aunt of King Henry VI., compelled to do penance bare-foot in a sheet in London, and after that to live in the Isle of Man in banishment, for "sorcery." In 2 Henry VI., Shakespeare makes Queen Margaret "box her ears," but this could not be, as Eleanor was banished three years before Margaret came to England.

Stand forth dame Eleanor Cobham Gloucester's wife
You maintain day's ill of your honour
Fall after three days' tyn penance done,
Live in your country here in banishment.
With Sir John E. entry in the 1st of Man.
Bluskenne, 2 Henry VI. act II. sc. 3 (1511)

Cocagne (The Land of), a poem full of life and animation, by Hans Sachs, the cobbler, called "The prince of minstrel-singers" (1491-1574)

Cock and Pie Douce explains thus

In the days of chivalry it was the practice to make a solemn vow for the performance of any considerable enterprise. This was usually done at some festival, when a roasted peacock, being served up in a dish of gold or silver was presented to the knight who then made his vow with great solemnity.

Cock of Westminster (The) Castil, a shoemaker, was so called from his very early hours. He was one of the benefactors of Christ's Hospital (London)

Cockade

The Black Cockade. Badge of the house of Hanover, worn at first only by the servants of the royal household, the diplomatic corps, the army, and navy, but now worn by the servants of justices, deputy-lieutenants, and officers both of the militia and volunteers.

The White Cockade (1) Badge of the Stuarts, and hence of the Jacobites (2) Badge of the Bourbons, and hence of the royalists of France.

The White and Green Cockade. Badge worn by the French in the "Seven Years' War" (1756)

The Blue and Red Cockade. Badge of the city of Paris from 1789

The Tricolour was the union of the white Bourbon and blue and red of the city of Paris. It was adopted by Louis XVI. at the Hôtel de Ville, July 17, 1789, and has ever since been recognized as the national symbol, except during the brief "restoration," when the Bourbon white was for the time restored.

Royal Cockades are large and circular, half the disc projects above the top of the hat.

Acral Cockades have no fan-shaped appendage, and do not project above the top of the hat.

(All other cockades worn for liveries are fan-shaped.)

Cockaigne (The Land of), an imaginary land of pleasure, wealth, luxury, and idleness. London is so called. Boileau applies the word to Paris. The Land of Cockayne is the subject of a burlesque, which, Warton says, "was evidently written soon after the Conquest, at least before the reign of Henry II."—History of English Poetry, i. 12

The houses were made of barley-bread and cake, the streets were paved with pastry, and the shops supplied goods without requiring money in payment.—The Land of Cockaigne (an old French poem, thirteenth century)

(This satirical poem is printed at length by Ellis, in his Specimens of Early English Poets, i. 83-95)

Cocker (Edward) published a useful treatise on arithmetic in the reign of Charles II., which had a prodigious success, and has given rise to the proverb, "According to Cocker" (1632-1676)

Cockle (Sir John), the miller of Mansfield, and keeper of Sherwood Forest. Hearing a gun fired one night, he went into the forest, expecting to find porchers, and seized the king (Henry VIII.), who had been hunting and had got separated from his courtiers. When the miller discovered that his captive was not a porcher, he offered him a night's lodging. Next day the courtiers were brought to Cockle's house by under-keepers, to be examined as porchers, and it was then discovered that the miller's guest was the king. The "merry monarch" knighted the miller, and settled on him 1000 marks a year.—R. Dodderley, The King and the Miller of Mansfield (1737).

Cockney (Nicholas), a rich city grocer, brother of Barnacle Priscilla Tomboy, of the West Indies, is placed under his charge for her education

Walter Cockney, son of the grocer, in the shop. A conceited young prig, not yet out of the quarrelsome age. He makes boy-love to Priscilla Tomboy and Miss La Blond, but says he will "tell papa" if they cross him

Penelope Cockney, sister of Walter — The Rump (altered from Bickerstaff's Love in the City)

Cockpit of Europe Belgium is so called because it has been the site of more European battles than any other, e.g. Oudenarde, Ramillies, Fontenoy, Fleurus, Jemmapes, Ligny, Quatre Bras, Waterloo, etc

Cocytus, one of the five rivers of hell. The word means the "river of weeping" (Greek, κόλυτος, "lament"), because "into this river fall the tears of the wicked." The other four rivers are Styx, Ach'eron, Phleg'ethon, and Let'h'e (See STYX)

Cocytus named of lamentation loud

Colebs' Wife, a bachelor's ideal of a model wife. Colebs is the hero of a novel by Mrs Hannah More, entitled Colebs in Search of a Wife (1809)

In short she was a walking calculation
All Takeworth's novels steppling from their covers
Or Tremmors' books on education
Or Colebs' wife set out in quest of lovers.
Byron Don Juan I. 16 (1819)

Coffin (Long Tom), the best sailor character ever drawn. He is introduced in The Pilot, a novel by J. Lemmore Cooper, of New York. Cooper's novel has been dramatized by L. Itzball, under the same name, and Long Tom Coffin preserves in the burlesque his reckless daring, his unswerving fidelity, his simple-minded affection, and his love for the sea

Cogia Houssain, the captain of forty thieves, outwitted by Morgiana, the slave. When, in the guise of a merchant, he was entertained by Ali Baba, and refused to eat any salt, the suspicions of Morgiana were aroused, and she soon detected him to be the captain of the forty thieves. After supper she amused her master and his guest with dancing, then playing with Cogia's dagger for a time, she plunged it suddenly into his heart and killed him — Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba or the Forty Thieves")

Cola (2 syl), Kyle, in Arshire. So called from Colus, a Pictish monarch. Sometimes all Scotland is so called, as

Farewell old Cola's hills and dales
Her heathy moors and winding vales.

Burns

Cola'da, the sword taken by the Cid from Ramon Ber'enger, count of Barcelona. This sword had two hilts of solid gold

Cola'x, Flattery personified in The Purple Island (1631), by Phineas Fletcher. Cola'x "all his words with sugar spees lets his tongue to sin, and takes rent of shame. His art [was] to hide and not to heal a sore." Fully described in canto viii (Greek, κόλαξ, "a flatterer or sower")

Colebrand or Colebrond (2 syl), the Danish giant, slain in the presence of king Athelstan, by sir Guy of Warwick, just returned from a pilgrimage, still "in homely russet clad," and in his hand "a hermit's staff." The combat is described at length by Dryden, in his Polyolbion, viii

One could scarcely bear his axe
Who o' squares were told with plates, and riveted with steel
And armed down along with yokes whose hardened points
Had power to tear the joints
Of culms or of mail.

Dryden Polyolbion xii. (1613)

Cold Harbour House, the original Herald's College, founded by Richard II, in Poultney Lane. Henry VII turned the heralds out, and gave the house to bishop Tunstall

Coldstream (Sir Charles), the chief character in Charles Mathew's play called Used Up. He is wholly ennuye, sees nothing to admire in anything, but is a living personification of mental inanity and physical imbecility

Cole (1 syl), a legendary British king, described as "a merry old soul," fond of his pipe, fond of his glass, and fond of his "buddlers three." There were two kings so called—Cole (or Coil I) was the predecessor of Porrex, but Coil II was succeeded by Lucius, "the first British king who embraced the Christian religion." Which of these two mythical kings the song refers to is not evident.

Cole (Mrs) This character is designed for Mother Douglas, who kept a "gentlemen's magazine of frail beauties" in a superbly furnished house at the north-east corner of Covent Garden. She died 1761.—S. Foote, The Minor (1760).

Colein (2 syl), the great dragon slain by Sir Bevis of Southampton.—Drayton, Polyolbon, II (1612).

Colemira (3 syl), a poetical name for a cook. The word is compounded of coal and mirre.

Could I he cried express how bright a grace
Adorns thy morning hands and well washed face
Thou wouldst Colemira grant what I implore
And yield me love or wash thy face no more."
Shearstone Colemira (an eclogue)

Cole'pepper (Captain) or CAPTAIN PRERLINCULI, the Alsatian bull.—Sir W. Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Colin, or in Scotch Cailein, Green Colin, the laird of Dunstaffnage, so called from the green colour which prevailed in his tartan.

Colin and Rosalinde In The Shepherde's Calendar (1579), by Edm. Spenser, Rosalinde is the maiden vainly beloved by Colin Clout, as her choice was already fixed on the shepherd Menalcas. Rosalinde is an anagram of "Rose Danil," a lady beloved by Spenser (Colin Clout), but Rose Danil had already fixed her affections on John Florio the Resolute, whom she subsequently married.

And I to thee will be as kind
As Colin was to Rosalinde,
Of course the flower
M. Dryden Douglas (1593)

Colin Clout, the pastoral name assumed by the poet Spenser, in The Shepherde's Calendar, The Ruins of Time, Daphniaida, and in the pastoral poem called Colin Clout's Come Home Again (from his visit to Sir Walter Raleigh). Ecl. I and XII are soliloquies of Colin, being lamentations that Rosalinde will not return his love. Ecl. VI is a dialogue between Robinol and Colin, in which the former tries to comfort the disappointed lover. Ecl. XI is a dialogue between Thenot and Colin. Thenot begs Colin to sing some joyous lay, but Colin pleads grief for the death of the shepherdess Dido, and then sings a monody on the great shepherdess deceased. In ecl. VI we are told that Rosalinde has betrothed herself to the shepherd Menalcas (1579).

In the last book of the Fairy Queen, we have a reference to "Colin and his lassie" (Spenser and his wife) supposed to be Elizabeth, and elsewhere called "Mirabella" (See Clout, etc.).

Witness our Colin whom the all the Griefs
And all the Muses nursed
Yet all his hopes were crossed all suits denied,
Discouraged scorned his writings vilified,
Poorly poor man he lived, poorly poor man he died.
The Fletcher The Purple Island I. 1 (1633)

Colin Clout and his Lassie, referred to in the last book of the Fairy Queen, are Spenser and his wife Elizabeth, elsewhere called "Mirabella" (1596).

Colin Clout's Come Home Again "Colin Clout" is Spenser, who had been to London on a visit to "the Shepherd of the Ocean" (Sir Walter Raleigh), in 1589, on his return to Kilkenny, in Ireland, he wrote this poem. "Robinol" his friend (Gabriel Harvey, LL.D.) tells him how all the shepherds had missed him, and begs him to relate to him and them his adventures while abroad. The pastoral contains a eulogy of British contemporary poets, and of the court beauties of Queen Elizabeth (1591). (See Colin.)

Colin Tampon, the nickname of a Swiss, as John Bull means an Englishman, etc.

Colkitto (Tonnig), or "Vich Alister More," or "Alister M'Donnell," a Highland chief in the arms of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Colleen (May), the heroine of a Scotch ballad, which relates how "fause sir John" earned her to a rock for the purpose of throwing her down into the sea, but May outwitted him, and subjected him to the same fate as he had designed for her.

Colleen, i.e. "girl," Colleen bawn ("the blond girl"), Colleen rhuie ("the red-haired girl"), etc.

* Dion Boucicault has a drama entitled The Colleen Bawn.

Collier (Jem), a smuggler.—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Collingbourne's Rhyme The rhyme for which Collingbourne was executed was infancy, and being picked up by different vessels, were carried one to Syracuse and the other to Ephesus. The play supposes that Antipholus of Syracuse goes in search of his brother, and coming to Ephesus with his slave Dromio, a series of mistakes arises from the extraordinary likeness of the two brothers and their two slaves. Andriana, the wife of the Ephesian, mistakes the Syracusan for her husband, but he behaves so strangely that her jealousy is aroused, and when her true husband arrives he is arrested as a mad man. Soon after, the Syracusan brother being seen, the wife, supposing it to be her mad husband broken loose, sends to capture him, but he flees into a convent. Andriana now lays her complaint before the duke, and the lady abbess comes into court. So both brothers face each other, the mistakes are explained, and the abbess turns out to be Emilia the mother of the twin-brothers. Now, it so happened that Aegeon, searching for his son, also came to Ephesus, and was condemned to pay a fine or suffer death, because he, a Syracusan, had set foot in Ephesus. The duke, however, hearing the story, pardoned him. Thus Aegeon found his wife in the abbess, the parents their twin sons, and each son his long-lost brother.

* * The plot of this comedy is copied from the Menachmus of Plautus.

Comhal or Combail, son of Trahtal, and father of Fingal. His queen was Morna, daughter of Ithaddu. Comhal was slain in battle, fighting against the tribe of Morni, the very day that Fingal was born.—Ossian.

Fingal said to Aldo: I was born in the midst of battle.—Ossian. The Battle of Iora.

Comines [Cūm'in]. Philip des Comines, the favourite minister of Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy, is introduced by sir W. Scott in Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Coming Events

And coming events cast their shadows before.
Campbell. Lochiel's Warbling.

Com'leach (2 syl), a mountain in Ulster. The Lubar flows between Comleach and Cromal.—Ossian.

Commander of the Faithful (Imr al Muminn), a title assumed by Omar I., and retained by his successors in the caliphate (581, 631-644).

Commandment (The Eleventh), Thou shalt not be found out.

After all that Eleventh Commandment is the only one that it is vitally important to keep in these days.—R. H. Buxton. Jennie of the Iriacs i. iii. 314.

Commings (2 syl) (Count de), the hero of a novel so called by M^{de} de Tencin (1681-1749).

Committee (The), a comedy by the Hon. sir R. Howard. Mr. Day, a Cromwellite, is the head of a Committee of Sequestration, and is a dishonest, ranting rascal, under the thumb of his wife. He gets into his hands the deeds of two heiresses, Anne and Arbella. The former he calls Ruth, and passes her off as his own daughter, the latter he wants to marry to his booby son Abel. Ruth falls in love with colonel Careless, and Arbella with colonel Blunt. Ruth contrives to get into her hands the deeds, which she delivers over to the two colonels, and when Mr. Day arrives, quiets him by reminding him that she knows of certain deeds which would prove his ruin if divulged (1670).

T. Knight reproduced this comedy as a farce under the title of The Honest Thieves.

Common (Dol), an ally of Subtle the alchemist.—Ben Jonson, The Alchemist (1610).

Commoner (The Great), sir John Barnard, who in 1787 proposed to reduce the interest of the national debt from 4 per cent to 3 per cent, any creditor being at liberty to receive his principal in full if he preferred it. William Pitt, the statesman, is so called also (1759-1806).

Comne'nus (Alexius), emperor of Greece, introduced by sir W. Scott in Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Anna Comne'na, the historian, daughter of Alexius Comnenus, emperor of Greece.—Same novel.

Compeyson, a would-be gentleman and a forger. He duped Abel Magwitch and ruined him, keeping him completely under his influence. He also jilted Miss Havisham.—C. Dickens, Great Expectations (1860).

Com'rade (2 syl), the horse given by a fairy to Fortunio.

He has many rare qualities. First he eats but once in eight days, and then he knows what's past, present and to come [and speaks with the voice of a man].—Comtesse D'Aunoy. Fairy Tales (Fortunio 163.).

Comus, the god of revelry. In Milton's "masque" so called, the 'lady' is lady Alice Egerton, the younger brother is Mr Thomas Egerton, and the elder brother is lord viscount Brackley (eldest son of John earl of Bridgewater, president of Wales). The lady, weary with long walking, is left in a wood by her two brothers, while they go to gather "cooling fruit" for her. She sings to let them know her whereabouts, and Comus, coming up, promises to conduct her to a cottage till her brothers could be found. The brothers, hearing a noise of revelry, become alarmed about their sister, when her guardian spirit informs them that she has fallen into the hands of Comus. They run to her rescue, and arrive just as the god is offering his captive a potion, the brothers seize the cup and dash it on the ground, while the spirit invokes Sabrina, who breaks the spell and releases the lady (1634).

Co'na or Cor, a river in Scotland, falling into Lochleven. It is distinguished for the sublimity of its scenery. Glen-coe is the glen held by the M Donalds (the chief of the clan being called Maclean). In "Ossian," the bard Ossian (son of Fingal) is called "The voice of Co'na"—Ossian, Songs of Selma.

They praised the voice of Co'na, first among a thousand bards.

Ossian Songs of Selma

Conach'ar, the Highland apprentice of Simon Glover, the old glover of Perth. Conach'ar is in love with his master's daughter, Catharine, called "the fair maid of Perth," but Catharine loves and ultimately marries Henry Smith, the armourer. Conach'ar is at a later period Jan Lauchin [Hector] M'Ian, chief of the clan Quhele—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.)

Conar, son of Trenmor, and first "king of Ireland." When the Fir-bolg (or Belgæ from Britain settled in the south of Ireland) had reduced the Cael (or colony of Caledonians settled in the north of Ireland) to the last extremity by war, the Cael sent to Scotland for aid. Trathel (grandfather of Fingal) accordingly sent over Conar with an army to their aid, and Conar, having reduced the Fir-bolg to submission, assumed the title of "king of Ireland." Conar was succeeded by his son Cormac I., Cormac I. by his son Cuibre, Cuibre by his son Artho, Artho by his son Cormac II. (a minor), and Cormac (after a slight interregnum) by Fernð Artho (restored by Fingal)—Ossian.

Con-Cathlin (means "mild beam of the wave"), the pole-star.

While yet my lo'ers were young I marked Con Cathlin on high from ocean's mighty wave.—Ossian Oina Morut

Confessio Amantis, by Gower (1393), above 30,000 verses. It is a dialogue between a lover and his confessor, a priest of Venus named Genius. As every vice is unamiable, a lover must be free from vice in order to be amiable, he beloved, consequently, Genius examines the lover on every vice before he will grant him absolution. Tale after tale is introduced by the confessor, to show the evil effects of particular vices, and the lover is taught science, and "the Aristotelian philosophy," the better to equip him to win the love of his choice. The end is very strange. The lover does not complain that the lady is obdurate or faithless, but that he himself has grown old.

Gower is indebted a good deal to Fuscus's Greek romance of Isménê and Ismenus, translated by Viterbo. Shakespeare drew his Pericles Prince of Tyre from the same romance.

Confession. The emperor Wenceslas ordered John Nepomuc to be cast from the Moldau bridge, for refusing to reveal the confession of the empress. The martyr was canonized as St John Nepomucen, and his day is May 11 (1330-1383).

Congreve (The Modern), R. B. Sheridan (1751-1816).

The school for scandal crowned the reputation of the modern Congreve in 1777—Cralk, Literature and Learning in England, v. 7.

Conkey Chickweed, the man who robbed himself of 327 guineas, in order to make his fortune by exciting the sympathy of his neighbours and others. The tale is told by detective Blathers—C. Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837).

Conlath, youngest son of Morni, and brother of the famous Gaul (a man's name). Conlath was betrothed to Cu-tho'na, daughter of Ruma, but before the espousals Toscar came from Ireland to Morni, and was hospitably received by Morni. Seeing Cuthona out hunting, Toscar carried her off in his staff by force, and being overtaken by Conlath they both fell in fight. Three days afterwards Cuthona died of grief.—Ossian, Conlath and Cuthona

Connal, son of Colgar petty king of Togorma, and intimate friend of Cuthullin general of the Irish tribes. He is a kind of Ulisses, who counsels and comforts Cuthullin in his distress, and is the very opposite of the rash, presumptuous, though generous Calmar.—Ossian, Fingal

Con'nell (Father), an aged catholic priest, full of gentle affectionate feelings. He is the patron of a poor vagrant boy called Naddy Fennel, whose adventures furnish the incidents of Banims novel called Father Connell (1842)

Father Connell is no unworthy association with the Protestant Flower of Walsley.—E. Chambers, English Literature, ii. 612.

Coningsby, a novel by B Disraeli. The characters are meant for portraits, thus "Rigby" represents Croker, "Menmouth," lord Hertford, "Eskdale," Lowther, "Ormsby," Irving, "Lucretia," Mde Zachy, "countess Colonna," lady Strachan, "Sidonia," baron A. de Pothschild, "Henry Sidney," lord John Manners, "Belvoir" (duke of Putland, second son of Beaumont) Lord Palmerston.—Notes and Queries, March 6, 1875

Conqueror (The) Alexander the Great, The Conqueror of the World (n.c. 356, 336-323) Alfonso of Portugal (1034, 1137-1185) Aurangzebe the Great called Alegru (1618, 1659-1707) James of Aragon (1206, 1213-1276) Othman or Osman I., founder of the Turkish empire (1259, 1299-1326) Francisco Pizarro, called Conquistador, because he conquered Peru (1475-1541) William duke of Normandy, who obtained England by conquest (1027, 1066-1187)

Con'rad (Lord) the corsair, afterwards called Lara. A proud, ascetic but successful pirate. Hearing that the sultan Seid [Scid] was about to attack the pirates, he entered the palace in the disguise of a dervise, but being found out was seized and imprisoned. He was released by Gulnare (2 syl), the sultan's favourite concubine, and fled with her to the Pirates' Isle, but finding his Medora dead, he left the island with Gulnare, returned to his native land, headed a rebellion and was shot.—Lord Byron, The Corsair, continued in Lara (1814)

Con'rade (2 syl), a follower of don John (bastard brother of don Pedro prince of Aragon)—Shakespeare, Much Ado About Nothing (1600)

Con'rade (2 syl), marquis of Montserrat, who with the Grand-Master of the Templars conspired against Richard Cœur de Lion. He was unhorsed in combat, and murdered in his tent by the Templar.—Sir W Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I.)

Consenting Stars, stars forming certain configurations for good or evil. Thus we read in the book of Judges v 20, "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera," i.e. formed configurations which were unlucky or malignant.

scourge the bad consenting stars,

Elizabeth the Fifth too labours to live long!
Shakespeare, 1 Henry VI act I. sc. 1 (1592)

Constance, mother of prince Arthur and widow of Geoffrey Plantagenet.—Shakespeare, King John (1598)

J. A. Bailey's "Lady Macbeth," Constance and queen Katherine (Henry VIII), were powerful embodiments and I question if they have ever since been so finely portrayed (1755-1850).—J. A. Bailey, Recollections.

Constance, daughter of sir William Fondlove, and courted by Wildrake, a country squire, fond of field sports. "Her beauty rich, richer her grace, her mind yet richer still, though richest all." She was "the mould express of woman, stature, feature, body, limb," she danced well, sang well harped well. Wildrake was her childhood's playmate, and became her husband.—S Knowles, The Love Chase (1837)

Constance, daughter of Bertulphe provost of Bruges, and bride of Bouchard a knight of Flanders. She had "beauty to shame young love's most fervent dream, virtue to form a saint, with just enough of earth to keep her woman." By an absurd law of Charles "the Good," earl of Flanders, made in 1127, this young lady, brought up in the lap of luxury, was reduced to serfdom, because her grandfather was a serf, her aristocratic husband was also a serf because he married her (a serf). She went mad at the reverse of fortune, and died.—S Knowles, The Provost of Bruges (1836)

Constans, a mythical king of Britain. He was the eldest of the three sons of Constantine, his two brothers being Aurelius Ambrosius and Uther Pendragon. Constans was a monk, but at the death of his father he laid aside the cowl for the crown Vortigern caused him to be assassinated, and usurped the crown Aurelius Ambrosius succeeded Vortigern, and was himself succeeded by his younger brother, Uther Pendragon, father of king Arthur Hence it will appear that Constans was Arthur's uncle

Constant (Ned), the former lover of lady Brute, with whom he intrigued after her marriage with the surly knight — Vanbrugh, The Provoked Wife (1697)

Constant (Sir Bashful), a younger brother of middle life, who tumbles into an estate and title by the death of his elder brother He marries a woman of quality, but finding it comme il faut not to let his love be known, treats her with indifference and politeness, and though he dotes on her, tries to make her believe he loves her not He is very soft, carried away by the opinions of others, and is an example of the truth of what Dr Young has said, "What is mere good nature but a fool?"

Lady Constant, wife of sir Bashful, a woman of spirit, taste, sense, wit, and beauty She loves her husband, and repels with scorn an attempt to shake her fidelity because he treats her with cold indifference.—A Murphr, The Way to keep Him (1760)

Constancia, sister of Petruccio governor of Bologna, and mistress of the duke of Ferrara —Berumont and Fletcher, The Chances (1620)

Constantia, a protégée of lady McSycephant An amiable girl, in love with Egerton McSycephant, by whom her love is amply returned —C Macklin, The Man of the World (1764)

Contest (Sir Adam) Having lost his first wife by shipwreck, he married again after the lapse of some twelve or fourteen years His second wife was a girl of 18, to whom he held up his first wife as a pattern and the very paragon of women On the wedding day this first wife made her appearance She had been saved from the wreck, but sir Adam wished her in heaven most sincerely

Lady Contest, the bride of sir Adam, "young, extremely lively, and prodigiously beautiful" She had been brought up in the country, and treated as a child, so her naïveté was quite captivating When she quitted the bridegroom's house, she said, "Good-bye, sir Adam, good-bye I did love you a little, upon my word, and should be really unhappy if I did not know that your happiness will be infinitely greater with your first wife"

Mr Contest, the grown-up son of sir Adam, by his first wife —Mrs Inchbold, The Wedding Day (1790)

CONTINENCE

ALEXANDER THE GREAT having gained the battle of Issus (u c 333), the family of king Darius fell into his hands, but he treated the ladies as queens, and observed the greatest decorum towards them A eunuch, having escaped, told Darius that his wife remained unspotted, for Alexander had shown himself the most continent and generous of men—Arrian, Anabasis of Alexander, iv 20

Scipio Africanus, after the conquest of Spain, refused to touch a beautiful princess who had fallen into his hands, "lest he should be tempted to forget his principles." It is, moreover, said that he sent her back to her parents with presents, that she might marry the man to whom she was betrothed. A silver shield, on which this incident was depicted, was found in the river Rhone by some fishermen in the seventeenth century.

Even Scipio, or a victor yet more cold
Might have forgot his virtue at her sh,ht.
N. Howe Tamertane ill 3 (1704)

ANSON, when he took the Senhora Theresa de Jesus, refused even to see the three Spanish ladies who formed part of the prize, because he was resolved to prevent private scandal. The three ladies consisted of a mother and her two daughters, the younger of whom was "of surpassing beauty."

Contractions The following is probably the most remarkable—"Utacumund" is by the English called Ooty (India). "Cholmondeley," contracted into Chumly, is another remarkable example.

Conventual Friars are those who live in convents, contrary to the rule of St Francis, who enjoined absolute poverty, without land, books, chapel, or house. Those who conform to the rule of the founder are called "Observant Friars."

Conversation Sharp, Richard Sharp, the critic (1759-1835)

Cook who Killed Himself (The) Vatel killed himself in 1671, because the lobster for his turbot sauce did not arrive in time to be served up at the banquet at Chantilly, given by the prince de Condé to the king.

Cooks (Wages received by) In Rome as much as £800 a year was given to a chef de cuisine, but Carême received £1000 a year.

Cooks of Modern Times Vatel, cook of the great Condé, Carême, the "Regenerator of Cookery" (1781-1833), Ude, the most learned of all cooks, Fraucatelli, who succeeded Ude at Crockford's (1805-1876), Gouffé, Alexis Soyer, whose epitaph is Soyeur tranquille, died 1858 (See TRIMALCHI)

Cooper (Anthony Ashley), earl of Shaftesbury, introduced by sir W Scott in Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.)

Cooper (Do you want a?) that is, "Do you want to taste the wines?" This question is addressed to those who have an order to visit the London docks. The "cooper" bores the casks, and gives the visitor the wine to taste.

Cophet'ua or Copet'hua, a mythical king of Africa, of great wealth, who fell in love with a beggar-girl, and married her. Her name was Penel'ophon, but Shakespeare writes it Zencel'ophon in Love's Labour's Lost, act iv sc 1. Tennyson has versified the tale in The Beggar-Maid—Perez, Reliques, l ii 6.

Cop'ley (Sir Thomas), in attendance on the earl of Leicester at Woodstock—Sir W Scott, Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Copper Captain (A), Michael Perez, a captain without money, but with a plentiful stock of pretence, who seeks to make a martinet of his person and commission by marrying an heiress. He is caught in his own trap, for he marries Estifania, a woman of intrigue, fancying her to be the heiress Marguritta. The captain gives the lady "pearls," but they are only whittings' eyes. His wife says to him:

Here's a goodly Jewel
Did you not win this at Goletta, captain?
See how it sparkles like an old lady's eyes
And here's a chain of whittings' eyes for pearls
Your clothes are parallels to these—all counterfeit
Put these and them on you're a man of copper
A copper copper Captain.
Beaumont and Fletcher Rule a Wife and Have a Wife (1610)

(W Lewis (1718-1811) was famous in this character, but Robert Wilks (1670-1732) was wholly unrivalled.)

The old stage critics delighted in the Copper Captain. "It was the test for every comedian. It could be worked on like a picture and new readings given. Here it must be admitted that Wilks had no rival."—Fitzgerald

Copperfield (David), the hero of a novel so called, by C Dickens. David is Dickens himself, and Micawber is Dickens's father. According to the tale, David's mother was nursery governess in a family where Mr Copperfield visited. At the death of Mr Copperfield, the widow married Edward Murdstone, a hard, tyrannical man, who made the home of David a dread and terror to the boy. When his mother died, Murdstone sent David to lodge with the Micawbers, and bound him apprentice to Messrs Murdstone and Grinby, by whom he was put into the warehouse, and set to paste labels upon wine and spirit bottles. David soon became tired of this dreary work, and ran away to Dover, where he was kindly received by his [great]-aunt Betsey Trotwood, who clothed him, and sent him as day-boy to Dr Strong, but placed him to board with Mr Wickfield, a lawyer, father of Agnes, between whom and David a mutual attachment sprang up. David's first wife was Dora Spenlow, but at the death of this pretty little "child-wife," he married Agnes Wickfield—C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849).

Copperheads, members of a faction in the north, during the civil war in the United States. The copperhead is a poisonous serpent, that gives no warning of its approach, and hence is a type of a concealed or secret foe. (The Argon- cephalus contortrix.)

Coppernose (3 syl) Henry VIII was so called, because he mixed so much copper with the silver coin that it showed after a little wear in the parts most pronounced, as the nose. Hence the sobriquets "Coppernosed Harry," "Old Coppernose," etc.

Copple, the hen killed by Reynard, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498).

Cora, the gentle, loving wife of Alonzo, and the kind friend of Rolla general of the Peruvian army—Sheridan, Pizarro (altered from Kotzebue, 1799).

Cor'ah, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Dr Titus Oates. As Corah was the political calumniator of Moses and Aaron, so Titus Oates was the political calumniator of the pope and English papists. As Corah was punished by "going down alive into the pit," so Oates was "condemned to imprisonment for life," after being publicly whipped and exposed in the pillory. North describes Titus Oates as a very short man, and says, "if his mouth were taken for the centre of a circle, his chin, forehead, and cheekbones would fall in the circumference."

Sank were his eyes, his voice was harsh and loud, bare signs he neither choleric was, nor proud,

His long chin poked his wit, his saint-like eyes,
A Chaucerianism, and a Moses face,
His memory miraculously great
Could print, exceeding man's belief, repeat Dryden Absalom and Achitophel l. 1163.

Corbaccio (Signior), the dupe of Moseca the knavish confederate of Volpone (2 syl). He is an old man, with "seeing and hearing faint, and understanding dulled to childishness," yet he wishes to live on, and

Fears not his great nor pale, feels himself
Younger by scores of years, flatters his age
With confident believing it, hope he may
With charms, like El, on have his youth recovered.
Ben Jonson Volpone or the Fox (1610).

Benjamin Johnson (1653-1722) seemed to be proud to wear the poet's double name, and was particularly great in all that an hero plays that were usually performed viz. Wasp in Bartholomew Fair, Corbaccio in Moor, The Silent Woman, and Alas in The Alchemist—Chenwood.

C Dibdin says none who ever saw W Parsons (1736-1795) in "Corbaccio" could forget his effective mode of exclaiming "Has he made his will? What has he given me?" but Parsons himself says "Ah! to see 'Corbaccio' acted to perfection, you should have seen Shuter. The public are pleased to think that I act that part well, but his acting was as far superior to mine as mount Vesuvius is to a rushlight."

Corbant, the rook, in the beast-epic of Peynard the Fox (1198) (French corbeau, "a rook").

Corbrech'tan or Corybrechtan, a whirlpool on the west coast of Scotland, near the isle of Jura. Its name signifies "Whirlpool of the prince of Denmark," from the tradition that a Danish prince once wagered to cast anchor in it, but perished in his foolhardiness. In calm weather the sound of the vortex is like that of innumerable chariots driven with speed.

The distant lies that bear the loud Corbrechtan roar
Campbell, Gerrard of Rynie l. 5 (1849).

Coree'ca (3 syl), mother of Abess. The word means "blindness of heart," of Romanism. Una sought shelter under her hut, but Coreeca shut the door against her, whereupon the lion which accompanied Una broke down the door. The "lion" means England, "Coreeca" popery, "Una" protestantism, and "breaking down the door" the Reformation—Spenser, Fairy Queen, l. 3 (1590).

Cordelia, youngest daughter of King Lear. She was disinherited by her royal father, because her protestations of love were less violent than those of her sisters. Cordelia married the king of France, and when her two elder sisters refused to entertain the old king with his suite, she brought an army over to dethrone them. She was, however, taken captive, thrown into prison, and died there.

Her voice was ever soft,
Gentle and low an excellent thing in woman
Shakespeare King Lear act v. sc. 3 (1605).

Corflambo, the personification of sensuality, a giant killed by Arthur. Corflambo had a daughter named Pæanna, who married Placidus, and proved a good wife to him — Spenser, Faery Queen, iv. 8 (1596).

Coriat (Thomas), died 1617, author of a book called Crudities.

Corin, "the faithful shepherdess," who having lost her true love by death, retired from the busy world, remained a virgin for the rest of her life, and was called "The Virgin of the Grove." The shepherd Thenot (final t pronounced) fell in love with her for her "fidelity," and to cure him of his attachment she pretended to love him in return. This broke the charm, and Thenot no longer felt that reverence of love he before entertained. Corin was skilled "in the dark, hidden virtuous use of herbs," and says

Of all green wounds I know the remedies
In men and cattle be they stung by snakes
Or charmed with powerful words of wicked art
Or be they love-sick.

John Fletcher The Faithful Shepherdess L. 1 (1610).

Corin, Corineus (3 syl), or Corineus (4 syl), "strongest of mortal men," and one of the suite of Brute (the first mythical king of Britain) (See CORINUS).

From Corin came it first? (i.e. the Cornish tug in sailing).

M. Drayton Polyolbion, l. 1612.

Corineus (3 syl) Southey throws the accent on the first syllable, and Spenser on the second. One of the suite of Brute. He overthrew the giant Goughmagol, for which achievement he was rewarded with the whole western horn of England, hence called Cornwa, and the inhabitants Cornweans (See CORIN).

Corineus challenged the giant to wrestle with him. At the beginning of the encounter Corineus and the giant stood face to face, but each other strongly in the arms, and grunted aloud for breath. But Corineus presently put his arms round the giant's waist, and broke three ribs with his right arm, and one on his left. At which Corineus having compassed round up his arms, and then taking up the giant, ran with him on Churchill Loveless (1761).

Corinne' (2 syl), the heroine and title of a novel by Miss de Staël. Her lover proved false, and the maiden gradually pined away.

Corinth 'Tis not every one who can afford to go to Corinth, 'tis not every one who can afford to indulge in very expensive licentiousness. Aristophanes speaks of the unheard-of sums (amounting to £200 or more) demanded by the harlots of Corinth — Plutarch, Parallel Lives, 1. 2.

Non culvis hominum coestibus adire Corinthum
Horace Epist. l. xvii. 30.

A Corinthian, a rake, a "fast man." Prince Henry says (1 Henry IV act ii. sc. 4), "[They] tell me I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff, but a Corinthian, a lad of mettle."

Corinthianism, harlotry.
To Corinthianise, to live an dissipated life.

Corinthian (To act the), to become a filite publique. Corinth was called the nursery of harlots, in consequence of the temple of Venus, which was a vast and magnificent brothel. Strabo says (Geog. viii.) "There were no fewer than a thousand harlots in Corinth."

Corinthian Brass, a mixture of gold, silver, and brass, which forms the best of all mixed metals. When Minus set fire to Corinth, the heat of the conflagration was so great that it melted the metal, which ran down the streets in streams. The three mentioned above ran together, and obtained the name of "Corinthian brass."

I think it may be of Corinthian brass,
Which was a mixture of all metals, but
The brass uppermost.

Byron Don Juan, vi. 25 (1821)

Corinthian Tom, "a fast man," the sporting rake in Pierce Egan's Life in London.

Coriolanus (Caius Marcius), called Coriolanus from his victory at Corioli. His mother was Veturia (not Volumnia), and his wife Volumnia (not Virgilia). Shakespeare has a drama so called. La Harpe has also a drama entitled Coriolan, produced in 1781.—Livy, Annals, ii. 40.

I remember her [Mrs. Siddons] coming down the stage in the triumphal entry of her son Coriolanus when her dumb-show drew plaudits that shook the house. She came alone, marching and beating time to the music, rolling from side to side, swelling with the triumph of her son. Such was the intoxication of joy which flashed from her eye and lit up her face that the effect was irresistible.—G. M. Young Coritani, the people of Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Rutlandshire, and Northamptonshire. Drayton refers to them in his Polyolbion, xvi. (1615).

Cork Street (London). So called from the Boyles, earls of Burlington and Cork. (See CLIFFORD STREET.)

Cormac I., son of Conar, a Gael, who succeeded his father as "king of Ireland," and reigned many years. In the latter part of his reign the Fir-bolg (or Belgæ settled in the south of Ireland), who had been subjugated by Conar, rebelled, and Cormac was reduced to such extremities that he sent to Fingal for aid. Fingal went with a large army, utterly defeated Colcuilla "lord of Atha," and re-established Cormac in the sole possession of Ireland. For this service Cormac gave Fingal his daughter Rosera'na for wife, and Ossian was their first son. Cormac I. was succeeded by his son Cairbre, Cairbre by his son Artho, Artho by his son Cormac II. (a minor), and Cormac II. after a short interregnum by Ferad-Artho—Ossian.

Cormac II. (a minor), king of Ireland. On his succeeding his father Artho on the throne, Swaran king of Lochlin [Scandinavia] invaded Ireland, and defeated the army under the command of Cuthullin. Fingal's arrival turned the tide of events, for next day Swaran was routed and returned to Lochlin. In the third year of his reign Torlath rebelled, but was utterly discomfited at lake Lego by Cuthullin, who, however, was himself mortally wounded by a random arrow during the pursuit. Not long after this Cairbar rose in insurrection, murdered the young king, and usurped the government. His success, however, was only of short duration, for having invited Oscar to a feast, he treacherously slew him, and was himself slain at the same time. His brother Cathmor succeeded for a few days, when he also was slain in battle by Fingal, and the Conar dynasty restored. Conar (first king of Ireland, a Caledonian) was succeeded by his son Cormac I., Cormac I. was succeeded by his son Cairbre, Cairbre by his son Artho, Artho by his son Cormac II., and Cormac II. (after a short interregnum) by his cousin Ferad-Artho—Ossian, Fingal, Dar-Thula, and Timora.

Cor'mack (Donald), a Highland robber-chief—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.)

Cor'malo, a "chief of ten thousand spears," who lived near the waters of Lano (a Scandinavian lake). He went to Inis-Thona (an island of Scandinavia), to the court of king Annir, and "sought the honour of the spear" (i.e. a tournament). Argon, the elder son of Annir, tilted with him and overthrew him. This vexed Cor'malo greatly, and during a hunting expedition he drew his bow in secret and shot both Argon and his brother Ruro. Their father wondered they did not return, when their dog Runa came bounding into the hall, howling so as to attract attention. Annir followed the hound, and found his sons both dead. In the mean time his daughter was carried off by Cor'malo. When Oscar, son of Ossian, heard thereof, he owed vengeance, went with an army to Lano, encountered Cor'malo, and slew him. Then rescuing the daughter, he took her back to Inis-Thona, and delivered her to her father—Ossian, The War of Inis-Thona.

Cor'moran (The Giant), a Cornish giant slain by Jack the Giant-killer. This was his first exploit, accomplished when he was a mere boy. Jack dug a deep pit, and so artfully filmed it over atop, that the giant fell into it, whereupon Jack knocked him on the head and killed him.

The Persian trick of "Ameen and the Ghoul" recurs

In the Scandinavian visit of Thor to Loth and Lollo come down to Germany in The Brave Little Tailor and to us in Jack the Giant Killer—Yonge.

Cornet, a waiting-woman on lady Fanciful. She caused great offence because she did not flatter her ladyship. She actually said to her, "Your ladyship looks very ill this morning," which the French waiting-woman contradicted by saying, "My opinion be, madam, dat your lityship never look so well in all your life." Lady Fanciful said to Cornet, "Get out of the room, I can't endure you," and then turning to Mdlle she added, "This wench is insufferably ugly." Oh, by-the-by, Mdlle, you can take these two pair of gloves. The French are certainly well-mannered, and never flatter"—Vanbrugh, The Provoked Wife (1697)

Corney (Mrs), matron of the workhouse where Oliver Twist was born. She is a well-to-do widow, who marries Bumble, and reduces the pompous headle to a hen-pecked husband.—C. Dickens, Oliver Twist, xxxvii (1837)

Cornflower (Henry), a farmer, who "beneath a rough outside, possessed a heart which would have done honour to a prince"

Mrs Cornflower (by birth Emma Belton), the farmer's wife, abducted by Sir Charles Courtly.—Dibdin, The Farmer's Wife (1780)

Corniole (4 syl), the cognomen given to Giovanni Bernardi, the great cornelian engraver, in the time of Lorenzo di Medici. He was called "Giovanni delle Corniole" (1495–1555)

Corn-Law Rhymer (The), Ebenezer Eliot (1781–1849)

Corporal (The Little) General Bonaparte was so called after the battle of Lodi (1796)

Corrector (Alexander the), Alexander Cruden, author of the Concordance to the Bible, for many years a corrector of the press, in London. He believed himself to be divinely inspired to correct the morals and manners of the world (1701–1770)

Cornu'reckan, an intermittent whirlpool in the Southern Hebrides, so called from a Danish prince of that name, who perished there

Corrouge' (2 syl), the sword of Sir Otuel, a presumptuous Saracen, nephew of Farracute (3 syl). Otuel was in the end converted to Christianity

Corsair (The), Lord Conrad, afterwards called Lara. Hearing that the Sultan Seyd [Said] was about to attack the pirates, he assumed the disguise of a dervise and entered the palace, while his crew set fire to the Sultan's fleet. Conrad was apprehended and cast into a dungeon, but being released by Gulnare (queen of the harem), he fled with her to the Pirates' Isle. Here he found that Medo'ra (his heart's darling) had died during his absence, so he left the island with Gulnare, returned to his native land, headed a rebellion, and was shot — Byron, The Corsair, continued in Lara (1814)

(This tale is based on the adventures of Lafitte, the notorious buccaneer. Lafitte was pardoned by general Jackson for services rendered to the States in 1815, during the attack of the British on New Orleans.)

Cor'sand, a magistrate at the examination of Dirk Hatteruek at Kippletringan — Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II.)

Corsican General (The), Napoleon I, who was born in Corsica (1769-1821)

Cor'sina, wife of the corsair who found Fairstar and Chery in the boat as it drifted on the sea. Being made very rich by her foster-children, Cor'sina brought them up as princes — Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("The Princess Fairstar," 1682)

Cortejo, a cavalier servant, who as Byron says in Beppo

Cord's servants gondola, must go to call
And carries fan and tippet, gloves and shawl.
Was it for this that no cortejo ere

Byron Don Juan, l. 1-3 (1819)

Corti'na (a cauldron) — It stood on three feet. The tripod of the Pythones was so called, because she sat in a kind of basin standing on three feet. When not in use, it was covered with a lid, and the basin then looked like a large metal ball.

Cor'via or Corvi'na, a valuable stone, which will cause the possessor to be both rich and honoured. It is obtained thus: Take the eggs from a crow's nest, and boil them hard, then replace them in the nest, and the mother will go in search of the stone, in order to revivify her eggs — Mirror of Stones

Corvi'no (Signior), a Venetian merchant, duped by Mosca into believing that he is Volpone's heir — Ben Jonson, Volpone or the Fox (1605)

Coryate's Crudities, a book of travels by Thomas Coryate, who called himself the "Odeombian Legstretchener." He was the son of the rector of Odecombe (1577-1617)

Coryc'ian Cave (The), on mount Parnassus, so called from the nymph Coryc'ia. Sometimes the Muses are called Coryc'ides (4 syl.)

The immortal Muse

Corycian Nymphs (The), the Muses, so called from the cave of Coryc'ia on Lycor'ia, one of the two chief summits of mount Parnassus, in Greece.

Cor'ydon, a common name for a shepherd. It occurs in the Idylls of Theocritus, the Eclogues of Virgil, The Cantata, v., of Hughes, etc.

Cor'ydon, the shepherd who languished for the fair Pastorella (canto 9). Sir Calidore, the successful rival, treated him most courteously, and when he married the fair shepherdess, gave Cor'ydon both flocks and herds to mitigate his disappointment (canto 11) — Spenser, Fairy Queen, vi. (1596)

Cor'ydon, the shoemaker, a citizen² — Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Coryphæus of German Literature (The), Goethe

The Ioli h. poet called upon the great Coryphæus of German literature — W. J. Morrell Notes and Queries, April 7, 1878.

Coryphe'us (1 syl.), a model man or leader, from the choruphaos or leader of the chorus in the Greek drama. Aristarchos is called The Corypheus of Grammarians.

I was in love with honour and reflected with pleasure that I should pass for the Corypheus of all domestics. — Leage Gill Glas iv. 7 (1774).

Cosme (St), patron of surgeons, born in Arabia. He practised medicine in Cilicia with his brother St. Damien, and both suffered martyrdom under Diocletian in 303 or 310. Their fête day is December 27. In the twelfth century there was a medical society called Saint Cosme.

Cos'miel (3 syl.), the genius of the world. He gave to Ibedodietus a boat of asbestos, in which he sailed to the sun and planets — Kireher, Eustatic Journey to Heaven.

Cosmos, the personification of "the world" as the enemy of man. Phineas Fletcher calls him "the first son to the Dragon red" (the devil). "Mistake," he says, "points all his darts," or, as the Preacher says, "Vanity, vanity, all is vanity." Fully described in The Purple Island, viii (1633) (Greek, losmos, "the world")

Costard, a clown who apes the court wits of queen Elizabeth's time. He uses the word "honorificabilitudinitatibus," and some of his blunders are very ridiculous, as "ad dunghill, at the fingers' ends, ns they say" (act v. 1) — Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost (1591)

Costin (Loré), disguised as a beggar, in The Beggar's Bush, a drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (1622)

Cote Male-tailé (Sir), meaning the "knight with the villainous coat," the nickname given by Sir Kay (the seneschal of King Arthur) to Sir Breunor le Noire, a young knight who wore his father's coat with all its sword-cuts, to keep him in remembrance of the vengeance due to his father. His first achievement was to kill a lion that "had broken loose from a tower, and came hurling after the queen." He married a damsel called Maledisant (3 syl), who loved him, but always eluded him. After her marriage she was called Beauvinant — Sir I. Malori, History of Prince Arthur, ii 12-50 (1470)

Coty'to, Goddess of the Edom of Thracæ. Her orgies resembled those of the Thracian Cybele (3 syl)

Wall goddess of nocturnal sport,

Count not your Chickens before they are Hatched. See Æsop's fable.

The Millmaid and her Pail, with Lafontaine's version The Millmaid Perrett. But the substance of this fable is very old. For example —

In A.D. 550 Barzûyeh translated for the king of Persia a collection of Indian fables called the Panka Tantra ("five books"), and one of the stories is that of a Bramin who collected rice by begging, but it occurred to him there might be a famine, in which case he could sell his rice for 100 rupees, and buy two goats. The goats would multiply, and he would then buy cows, the cows would calve, and he would buy a farm, with the savings of his farm he would buy a mansion, then marry some one with a rich dowry, there would be a son in due time, who should be named Somo Sala, whom he would dandle on his knees. If the child ran into danger he would cry to the mother, "Take up the baby! take up the baby!" In his excitement the castle-dreamer kicked over his packet of rice, and all his swans took wing. From this fable the Persians say of a castle-dreamer, "He is like the father of Somo Sala."

Another version of the story is given in "The History of the Barber's Fifth Brother," whose name was Alnasehar (q.v.) — Arabian Nights Entertainments

Rabelais has introduced a similar story called "The Shoemaker and a Mouth of Milk," told by Lehephron, in Pantagruel (See ECHÉMIOT)

Count of Narbonne, a tragedy by Robert Jephson (1782). His father, count Raymond, having poisoned Alphonse, forged a will barring Godfrey's right, and naming Raymond as success. Theodore fell in love with Adelaide, the count's daughter, but was reduced to this dilemma if he married Adelaide he could not challenge the count and obtain the possessions he had a right to as grandson of Alphonse, if, on the other hand, he obtained his rights and killed the count in combat, he could not expect that Adelaide would marry him. At the end the count killed Adelaide, and then himself. This drama is copied from Walpole's Castle of Otranto

Count Robert of Paris, a novel by Sir W. Scott, after the wreck of his fortune and repeated strokes of paralysis (1831). The critic can afford to be indulgent, and those who read this story must remember that the sun of the great wizard was hastening to its set. The time of the novel is the reign of Rufus

Crawford (Lord), captain of the Scottish guard at Plessis les Tours, in the pry of Louis XI—Sir W Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV)

Crawley (Sir Pitt), of Great Gaunt Street, and of Queen's Crawley, Hants. A sharp, miserly, litigious, vulgar, ignorant baronet, very rich, desperately mean, "a philosopher with a taste for low life," and intoxicated every night. Becky Sharp was engaged by him to teach his two daughters. On the death of his second wife, sir Pitt asked her to become lady Crawley, but Becky had already married his son, captain Rawdon Crawley. This "aristocrat" spoke of "brass farthings," and was unable to spell the simplest words, as the following specimen will show—"Sir Pitt Crawley begs Miss Sharp and baggage may be hear on Tuesday, as I leaf to-morrow erly." "The whole baronetage, peerage, and commonage of England did not contain a more cunning, mean, foolish, disreputable old rogue than sir Pitt Crawley." He died at the age of fourscore, "lamented and beloved, regretted and honoured," if we can believe his monumental tablet.

Lady Crawley. Sir Pitt's first wife was "a confounded, quarrelsome, high-bred jade." So he chose for his second wife the daughter of Mr Dawson, ironmonger, of Mudbury, who gave up her sweet-heart, Peter Butt, for the gilded vanity of Crawleyism. This ironmonger's daughter had "pink cheeks and a white skin, but no distinctive character, no opinions, no occupation, no amusements, no vigour of mind, no temper, she was a mere female machine." Being a "blonde, she wore draggled sea-green or slatternly sky-blue dresses," went about slipshod and in curl-papers all day till dinner-time. She died and left sir Pitt for the second time a widower, "to-morrow to fresh woods and pastures new."

Mr Pitt Crawley, eldest son of sir Pitt, and at the death of his father inheritor of the title and estates. Mr Pitt was a most proper gentleman. He would rather starve than dine without a dress-coat and white neckcloth. The whole house bowed down to him, even sir Pitt himself threw off his muddy gaiters in his son's presence. Mr Pitt always addressed his mother-in-law with "most powerful respect," and strongly impressed her with his high aristocratic breeding. At Pton he was called "Miss Crawley." His religious opinions were offensively aggressive and of the "evangelical type." He even built a meeting-house close by his uncle's church. Mr Pitt Crawley came into the large fortune of his aunt, Miss Crawley, married lady Jane Sheepshanks, daughter of the countess of Southdown, became an M P, grew money-loving and mean, but less and less "evangelical" as he grew great and wealthy.

Captain Rawdon Crawley, younger brother of Mr Pitt Crawley. He was in the Dragoon Guards, a "blood about town," and an adept in boxing, rat-hunting, the fires-court, and four-in-hand driving. He was a young dandy, six feet high, with a great voice, but few brains. He could swear a great deal, but could not spell. He ordered about the servants, who nevertheless adored him, was generous, but did not pay his tradesmen, a Lothario, free and easy. His style of talk was, "Aw, aw, Jave-aw, Gad-aw, it's a confounded fine segaw-aw—confounded as I ever smoked Gad-aw." This military exquisite was the adopted heir of Miss Crawley, but as he chose to marry Becky Sharp, was set aside for his brother Pitt. For a time Becky enabled him to live in splendour "upon nothing a year," but a great scandal got wind of gross improprieties between lord Steyne and Becky, so that Rawdon separated from his wife, and was given the governorship of Coventry Isle by lord Steyne. "His excellency colonel Rawdon Crawley died in his island of yellow fever, most deeply beloved and deplored," and his son Rawdon inherited his uncle's title and the family estates.

The Rev Bute Crawley, brother of sir Pitt. He was a "tall, stately, jolly, shovel-hatted rector." "He pulled stroke-oar in the Christ Church boat, and had thrashed the best brusters of the town. The Rev. Bute loved boxing-matches, races, hunting, coursing, balls, elections, regattas, and good dinners, had a fine singing voice, and was very popular." His wife wrote his sermons for him.

Mrs Bute Crawley, the rector's wife, was a smart little lady, domestic, politic, but apt to overdo her "policy." She gave her husband full liberty to do as he liked, was prudent and thrifty.—Thackeray, Vanity Fair (1848)

Crayon (Le Sieur de), one of the officers of Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy.—Sir W Scott, Annals of Gierstein (time, Edward IV)

Crayon (Geoffrey), Esq., Washington Irving, author of The Sketch-Book (1820)

Cressida, in Chaucer Cresseide (2 syl'), a beautiful, sparkling, and accomplished woman, who has become a by-word for infidelity. She was the daughter of Calchas, a Trojan priest, who took part with the Greeks. Cressida is not a character of classic story, but a mediæval creation. Pope says her story was the invention of Lollius the Lombard, historiographer of Urbino, in Italy. Cressida betrays herself to Troilus, a son of Priam, and vows eternal fidelity. Troilus gives the maiden a secre, and she gives her Adonis a glove, as a love-knot. Soon after this betrothal an exchange of prisoners is made, when Cressida falls to the lot of Diomed, to whom she very soon yields her love, and even gives him the very sleeve which Troilus had given her as a love-token.

As air as water wind or sandy earth
Yet let [men] say to stick the heart of falsehood
As false as Cressid
Shakespeare Troilus and Cressida act III. sc. 2 (1602)

Cresswell (Madame), a woman of infamous character, who bequeathed £10 for a funeral sermon, in which nothing ill should be said of her The duke of Buckingham wrote the sermon, which was as follows — "All I shall say of her is this she was born well, she married well, lived well, and died well, for she was born at Shad-well, married Cress-well, lived at Clerken-well, and died in Bride-well"

Crib (Tom), Thomas Moore, author of Tom Crib's Memorial to Congress (1819)

Crillon The following story is told of this brave but simple-minded officer Henri IV, after the battle of Arques, wrote to him thus

Frends-of brave Crillon, nous avons vaincu à Arques e' tu n'y étais pas.

The first and last part of this letter have become proverbial in France

When Crillon heard the story of the Crucifixion read at church, he grew so excited that he cried out in an audible voice, Ou tais tu, Crillon? ("What were you about, Crillon, to permit of such atrocity?")

 When Clovis was told of the Crucifixion, he exclaimed, "Had I and my Franks been by, we would have avenged the wrong, I warrant"

Crime—Blunder Talleyrand said of the execution of the due d'Enghien by Napoleon I, that it was "not merely a crime, it was a blunder" The words have been attributed to Fouché also

Crimora and Connal Crimora, daughter of Rival, was in love with Connal of the race of Fingal, who was defied by Dargo He begs his "sweeting" to lend him her father's shield, but she says it is ill-fated, for her father fell by the spear of Gormar Connal went against his foe, and Crimora, disguised in armour went also, but unknown to him She saw her lover in fight with Dargo, and discharged an arrow at the foe, but it missed its aim and shot Connal She ran in agony to his succour It was too late He died, Crimora died also, and both were buried in one grave — Ossian, Carric-Thura

Crispin (St) Crispinus and Crispianus were two brothers, born at Rome, from which place they travelled to Soissons, in France (about A.D. 303), to propagate the gospel, and worked as shoemakers, that they might not be chargeable to any one The governor of the town ordered them to be beheaded the very year of their arrival, and they were made the tutelary saints of the "gentile craft" St Crispin's Day is October 25

This day is called it a feast of Crispian
And Crispin Crispian shall we go by
I join this day to the ending of the world
But we in it shall be remembered.

Shakespeare, Henry V act IV sc. 3 (1599)

Critic (A Bossu), one who criticizes the "getting up" of a book more than its literary worth, a captious, carping critic Rene le Bossu was a French critic (1631-1680)

The epic poem your lordship bids me look at upon taking the length breadth height and depth of it and trying them at home upon an exact scale of Bossu's. Its out any lord in every one of its dimensions. Admirable connoisseur — Sterne

(Probably the scale referred to was that of Bossut the mathematician, and that either Bossu and Bossut have been confounded, or else that a pun is intended)

Leontine Croaler, son of Mr Croaker. Being sent to Paris to fetch his sister, he falls in love with Olivia Woodville, whom he brings home instead, introduces her to Croaker as his daughter, and ultimately marries her.—Goldsmith, The Good-natured Man (1768)

Crocodile (King) The people of Isna, in Upper Egypt, affirm that there is a king crocodile as there is a queen bee. The king crocodile has ears but no tail, and has no power of doing harm. Sonthey says that though the king crocodile has no tail, he has teeth to devour his people with.—Browne, Travels

Crocodile (Lady Kilty), meant for the duchess of Kingston.—Samr Loote, A Trip to Calais

Crocodile's Tears, deceitful show of grief, hypocritical sorrow

It is written that the crocodile will weep over a man's head when he hath devoured the body and then he will eat up the head too. Where ore in Latin there is a proverb Crocodili lac ryma (crocodile's tears) to signify such tears as are fained and spent only with intent to deceive or doo harm.—Bul'okar English Exposit or (1616)

Casar will weep the crocodile will weep
Dryden All for Love (1632)

Cro'eus, a young man enamoured of the nymph Smilax, who did not return his love. The gods changed him into the crocus flower, to signify unrequited love

Cræsus, king of Lydia, deceived by an oracle, was conquered by Cyrus king of Persia. Cyrus commanded a huge funeral pile to be erected, upon which Cræsus and fourteen Lydian youths were to be chained and burnt alive. When this was done, the discredited king called on the name of Solon, and Cyrus asked why he did so. "Because he told me to call no one happy till death." Cyrus, struck with the remark, ordered the fire of the pile to be put out, but this could not be done. Cræsus then called on Apollo, who sent a shower which extinguished the flames, and he with his Lydians came from the pile unharmed.

 The resemblance of this legend to the Bible account of the Jewish youths condemned by Nebuchadnezzar to be cast into the fiery furnace, from which they came forth uninjured, will recur to the reader.—Dan. 111.

Cræsus's Dream Cræsus dreamt that his son Atys would be slain by an iron instrument, and used every precaution to prevent it, but to no purpose, for one day Atys went to chase the wild boar, and Adrastus, his friend, threw a dart at the boar to rescue Atys from danger, the dart, however, struck the prince and killed him. The tale is told by William Morris in his Earthly Paradise ("July")

Croftangry (Mr Chrystal), a gentleman fallen to decay, cousin of Mrs Martha Bethune Balhol, to whom, at death, he left the MS of two novels, one The Highland Widow, and the other The Fair Maid of Perth, called the First and Second Series of the "Chronicles of Canongate" (q v). The history of Mr Chrystal Croftangry is given in the introductory chapters of The Highland Widow, and continued in the introduction of The Fair Maid of Perth.

Lockhart tells us that Mr Croftangry is meant for sir Walter Scott's father, and that "the fretful patient at the death-bed" is a living picture

Crofts (Master), the person killed in a duel by sir Geoffrey Hudson, the famous dwarf.—Sir W Scott, Peter of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Cross A favourite legend used to be that the Cross was made of three different trees, and that these trees sprang from three seeds taken from the "Tree of Life" and planted in Adam's mouth at death. They were given to Adam's son Seth by the angel who guarded paradise, and the angel told Seth that when these seeds became trees, Adam would be free from the power of death.

(This is rather an allegory than a legend. For other legends and traditions see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable)

Cross-legged Host (Dining with you), going without dinner. Lawyers at one time gave interviews to their clients in the Round Church, famous for its effigies of knights lying cross-legged.

Or walk the Round [Church] with knights o the po ts
About the cross-legged knights their hosts.

S Butler Hudibras lib 3 (1678)

Cross Purposes, a farce by O'Brien. There are three brothers named Bevil—Francis an M P, Harry a lawyer, and George in the Guards. They all, unknown to each other, wish to marry Emily Grub, the handsome daughter of a rich stock-broker. Francis pays court to the father, and obtains his consent, Harry to the mother, and obtains her consent, and George to the daughter, whose consent he obtains, and the two elder brothers retire from the field. The fun of the farce is the contention of the Grubs about a suitable husband, their joy at finding they have all selected Mr Bevil, and their amazement at discovering that there are three of the same name.

Cross Questions and Crooked Answers. An Irish recruit about to be inspected by Frederick the Great, was told he would be asked these questions: (1) How old are you? (2) How long have you been in the service? (3) Are you content with your pay and rations? So he prepared his answers accordingly. But it so happened that the king began with the second question. "How long have you been in the service?" Paddy glibly replied, "Twenty years." "Why," said the king, "how old are you?" "Six months." "Six months!" rejoined the king, "surely either you or I must be mad!" "Yes, both, your majesty."

Some Highlanders, coming to England for employ, conceived they would be asked (1) Who are you? (2) Why do you come here? and that the questioner might then say, "No, I don't want your service." Scarcely had they crossed the border than they came to the body of a man who had been murdered. They stopped to look at it, when a constable came up and said, "Who did this?" "We three Highlanders," was the prepared answer. "Why did you do it?" said the constable. "For the money and the silver," was the answer they had prepared. "You scoundrels," said the constable, "I shall hang you for this." "If you don't, another will," said the men, and were preparing to go away, when they were marched off to jail.

Cross'myloof, a lawyer—Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Crothar, "lord of Atha," in Connaught (then called Aineema). He was the first and most powerful chief of the Fir bolg ("bowmen") or Belge from Britain who colonized the southern parts of Ireland. Crothar carried off Conlma, daughter of Cathmin a chief of the Caci or Caledonians who had colonized the northern parts of Ireland and held their court in Ulster. As Conlma was betrothed to Turloch a Cael, he made an irruption into Connaught, slew Cormul, but was himself slain by Crothar, Cormul's brother. The feud now became general, "Blood poured on blood, and Erin's clouds were hung with ghosts." The Cael being reduced to the last extremity, Trathel (the grandfather of Fingal) sent Conar (son of Trenmor) to their relief. Conar, on his arrival in Ulster, was chosen king, and the Fir-bolg being subdued, he called himself "the king of Ireland"—Ossian, Temora, ii.

Crothar, vassal king of Croma (in Ireland), held under Artho over-lord of all Ireland. Crothar, being blind with age, was attacked by Rothmar chief of Tromlo, who resolved to annex Croma to his own dominion. Crothar sent to Fingal for aid, and Fingal sent his son Ossian with an army, but before he could arrive Tovar-Gormo, a son of Crothar, attacked the invader, but was defeated and slain. When Ossian reached Ulster, he attacked the victorious

Rothmar, and both routed the army and slew the chief — Ossian, Croma

Croto'na's Sage, Pythagoras, so called because his first and chief school of philosophy was established at Crotona (B. N. C. 510)

Crouch'mas, from the invention of the Cross to St. Helen's Day, i.e. from May 3 to August 18. Halliwell, in his Archaic Dictionary, says it means "Christmas," but this is wholly impossible, as Tusser in his "May Remembrances," says "From bull cow fast till Crouch-mas he past, i.e. St. Helen's Day." The word means "Cross-mas"

Crow As the crow flies, that is, straight from the point of starting, to the point to be reached, without being turned from the path by houses, rivers, hills, or other obstacles, which do not divert the crow from its flight. The Americans call it "The Bee-line"

Crowdero, one of the riddle leaders encountered by Hudibras at a bear-baiting. The awdemy figure of this character was Jackson or Jefferson, a milliner in the New Exchange, Strand, London. He lost a leg in the service of the roundheads, and was reduced to the necessity of earning a living by playing on the crowd or crowth from ale-house to ale-house — S. Butler, Hudibras, i. 2 (1634)

(The crowth was a long box-shaped instrument, with six or more strings, supported by a bridge. It was played with a bow. The first noted performer on this instrument was John Morgan, a Welshman, who died 1720)

Crowe (Captain), the attendant of Sir Launcelot Greaves (1 syl), in his peregrinations to reform society. Sir Launcelot is a modern don Quixote, and captain Crowe is his Sancho Panza

Captain Crowe had commanded a merchant ship in the Mediterranean trade for many years and saved some money by dint of frugality in his traffic. He was an excellent seaman, brave, active, friendly in his way, and scrupulously honest but as little acquainted with the world as a sucking child, whimsical, impatient, and so on. It is that he could not help revealing, in upon the conversation whatever it might be with repeated interruptions. When he himself attempted to speak he never finished his period — T. Smollett, The Adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves (1. 69)

Crowfield (Christopher), a pseudonym of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe (1814-)

Crown - Godfrey, when made the over-lord of Jerusalem, or "Baron of the Holy Sepulchre," refused to wear a crown of gold where his Saviour had only worn a crown of thorns

Canute, after the rebuke he gave to his flatterers, refused to wear thenceforth any symbol of royalty at all

Canute (truth worthy to be known)
From that time forth he for his brows disown
The ostentatious symbol of a crown
Extends a earthly royalty
I resumptuous and vain

Crown of the East, Antioch, also called "Antioch the Beautiful"

Crown of Ionia, Smyrna, the largest city of Asia Minor

Crowns Baron, in Don Juan, says the sultan is "master of thirty kingdoms" (canto vi. 90). The war of Russia is proclaimed as sovereign of seventeen crowns

 Of course the sultan is no longer master of thirty kingdoms, 1878

Crowned after Death Inez de Castro was exhumed six years after her assassination, and crowned queen of Portugal by her husband, don Pedro. (See INEZ DE CASTRO)

Crowquill (H. ed.) Alfred Henry Forrester, author of Letters from my Memorandum-Book (1879), one of the artists of Punch (1805-1872)

Croye (Isabelle countess of), a ward of Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy. She first appears at the turret window in Plessis les Tours, disguised as Jacqueline, and her marriage with Quentin Durward concludes the novel

The countess Humeline of Croye, aunt to countess Isabelle. First disguised as Dame Protte (2 syl) at Plessis les Tours, afterwards married to William de la Murck — Sir W. Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.)

Croye (Monseigneur de la), an officer of Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy — Sir W. Scott, Annals of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.)

Croysa'do (The Great), general lord Fairfax (1611-1671) — S. Butler, Hudibras

Crucifixion (The) When Clovis was told the story of the Crucifixion, he exclaimed, "Had I and my friends been there, we would soon have avenged the wrong"

When Crillon "the Brave" heard the tale, he grew so excited that he could not contain himself, and starting up in the church, he cried loud, Ou étas tu, Crillon? ("What were you about Crillon, to allow of such deeds as these?")

Crudor (Sir), the knight who told Briana he would not marry her till she brought him enough hair, consisting of ladies' locks and the beards of knights, to purple his cloak with. In order to obtain this love-gift, the lady established a toll, by which every lady who passed her castle had to give the hair of her head, and every knight his beard, as "pissing pay," or else fight for their lives. Sir Crudor being overthrown by sir Calidore, Briana was compelled to abolish this toll—Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 1 (1596)

Cruel (The), Pedro king of Castile (1334, 1350-1369)

Cruikshanks (Ebenezer), landlord of the Golden Candlestick inn—Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Crummles (Mr Vincent), the eccentric but kind-hearted manager of the Portsmouth Theatre

It was necessary that the writer should like Mr. Crummles, dramatist, construct his piece in the interest of the pump and washing tubs.—P Fitzgerald

Mrs Crummles, wife of Mr Vincent Crummles, a stout, ponderous, tragedy-queen sort of a lady. She walks or rather stalks like lady Macbeth, and always speaks theatrically. Like her husband, she is full of kindness, and always willing to help the needy

Miss Annetta Crummles, daughter of the manager, and called in the play-bills "the infant phenomenon"—C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Crumthormo, one of the Orkney or Shetland Islands—Ossian, Cath-Loda

Cruncher (Jerry), an odd-job man in Tellson's bank. His wife was continually saying her prayers, which Jerry termed "flopping." He was a "resurrection man"—C Dickens, A Tale of Two Cities (1859)

Crupp (Mrs), a typical humbug, who let chambers in Buckingham Street for young gentlemen. David Copperfield lodged with her—C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

Crushed by Ornaments Tarpeia, daughter of the governor of the Roman citadel on the Saturnian Hill, was tempted by the gold on the Sabine bracelets and collars to open a gate of the fortress to the besiegers, on condition that they would give her the ornaments which they wore on their arms. Tarpeia opened the gate, and the Sabines as they passed threw on her their shields, saying, "These are the ornaments worn by the Sabines on their arms," and the maid was crushed to death. G Gilfillan, alluding to Longfellow, has this erroneous allusion

His ornaments unlike those of the Sabine [sic] maid have not crushed him—Introductory Essay to Longfellow

Crusoe (Robinson), the hero and title of a novel by Daniel Defoe. Robinson Crusoe is a shipwrecked sailor, who leads a solitary life for many years on a desert island, and relieves the tedium of life by ingenious contrivances (1719)

(The story is based on the adventures of Alexander Selkirk, a Scotch sailor, who in 1704 was left by captain Stradding on the uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez. Here he remained for four years and four months, when he was rescued by captain Woods Rogers and brought to England)

Was there ever anything written by mere man that the reader wished longer except Robinson Crusoe, Don Quixote and The Pilgrim's Progress?—Dr Johnson

Cruth-Loda, the war-god of the ancient Gaels

On thy top Uthormo dwells the mighty Loda, the house of the spirits of men. In the end of his cloudy hall bends forward Cruth Loda of sword. His form is dimly seen amid the wavy mists: his right hand is on his shield.—Ossian, Cath Loda

Crystal'line (The). According to the theory of Ptolemy, the crystalline sphere comes after and beyond the firmament or sphere of the fixed stars. It has a shimmering motion, which somewhat interferes with that of the stars

They pass the planets seven and pass the fixed And that crystalline sphere whose balance weighs The trepidation talked of.

Milton, Paradise Lost III (1667)

Cuckold King (The), sir Mark of Cornwall, whose wife Isolde [I sold] intrigued with sir Tristram (his nephew), one of the knights of the Round Table

Cuckoo Pliny (Nat Hist v 9) says "Cuckoos lay always in other birds' nests"

But, since the cuckoo builds not for himself Remain in it as thou mayst Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra act II, sc. 6 (1608)

(The Bohemians say the festivals of the Virgin used to be held sacred even by dumb animals, and that on these sacred days all the birds of the air ceased building their nests except the cuckoo, which was therefore doomed to wander without having a nest of its own)

Cud'die or CUTHBERT HEADRICO, a ploughman, in the service of lady Bellenden of the Tower of Tithetndlem — Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

Cuddy, a herdsman, in Spenser's Shephearde's Calendar, in three eclogues of which Cuddy is introduced

Ecl ii is a dialogue between Thenot and Cuddy, in which Cuddy is a lad who complains of the cold, and Thenot laments the degeneracy of pastoral life. At one time shepherds and herdsmen were hardy, frugal, and contented, but nowadays, he says, "they are effeminate, luxurious, and ambitious." He then tells Cuddy the fable of "The Oak and the Bramble" (See THE NOT)

Ecl viii Cuddy is a full-grown man, appointed umpire to decide a contention in song, between the two shepherds, Willy and Perigot. He pronounced each to be worthy of the prize, and then sings to them the "Lament of Colin for Rosalind"

Ecl x is between Piers and Cuddy, the subject being "divine poetry." Cuddy declares no poet would be equal to Colin if his mind were not unhappily unglanced by disappointed love — Spenser, The Shephearde's Calendar (1579)

Cuddy, a shepherd, who boasts that the charms of his Bux'oma far exceed those of Blouzelinda. Lobbin, who is Blouzelinda's swain, repels the boast, and the two shepherds agree to sing the praises of their respective shepherdesses, and to make Cloddipole arbiter of their contention. Cloddipole listens to their alternate verses, pronounces that "both merit an oaken staff," but, says he, "the herds are weary of the songs, and so am I" — Gay, Pastorals, i (1711)

(This eclogue is in imitation of Virgil's Ecl iii)

Cui Bono? "Of what practical use is it?" — See Cicero, Pro Milone, vii 32

One that great and grave philosopher did commonly demand, when any new project was propounded unto him "Cui bono?" What good would ensue in case the same were effected? — Th Fuller Horities (The Design etc., 1)

Culdees (i.e. sequestered persons), the primitive clergy of presbyterian character, established in Io'na or Icolmkill [I-columb-kill] by St Columba and twelve of his followers in 563. They also founded similar church establishments at Abernethy, Dunkeld, Kirkcaldy [Kirk-Culdee], etc., and at Lindesfarne, in England. Some say as many as 300 churches were founded by them. Augustine, a bishop of Waterford, began against them in 1176 a war of extermination, when those who could escape sought refuge in Ioan, the original cradle of the sect, and were not driven thence till 1203

Peace to their shades! the pure Culdees
Were Albyn's [Scottish] earliest priests of God
Ere yet an island of her seas
By foot of Saxon monk was trod.

Campbell Peallura

Culloch (Sauney), a pedlar — Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Cumberland (John of) "The devil and John of Cumberland" is a blunder for "The devil and John-a-Cumber." John-a-Cumber was a famous Scotch magician

He poste to Scotland for brave John a Cumber
The only man
Oft have I hea
A Munday John

Cumberland (William Augustus duke of), commander-in-chief of the army of George II, whose son he was. The duke was especially celebrated for his victory of Culloden (1746), but he was called "The Butcher" from the great severity with which he stamped out the clan system of the Scottish Highlanders. He was wounded in the leg at the battle of Dettingen (1743). Sir W Scott has introduced him in Waverley (time, George II)

Proud Cumberland prances, insulting the slain
And their hoof-beaten bosoms are trod to the plain Campbell Lochiel's Warning

Cumberland Poet (The), William Wordsworth, born at Cockermouth (1770-1850)

Cum'bria. It included Cumberland, Dumbarton, Renfrew, Ayr, Lanark, Peebles, Selkirk, Roxburgh, and Dumfries

Cumnor Hall, a ballad by Mickle, the lament of Amy Robsart, who had been won and thrown away by the earl of Leicester. She says if roses and lilies grow in courts, why did he pluck the primrose of the field, which some country swain might have won and valued? Thus sore and sad the lady grieved in Cumnor Hall, and ere dawn the death bell rang, and never more was that countess seen

* * Sir W Scott took this for the groundwork of his Kenilworth, which he called Cumnor Hall, but Constable, has publisher, requested him to change the name

Cunégonde [Ku' na gond], the mistress of Candide (2 syl), in Voltaire's novel called Candide. Sterne spells it "Cunigund."

Cun'ningham (Archie), one of the archers of the Scotch guards at Plessis les Tours, in the pry of Louis XI—Sir W. Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.)

Cu'no, the ranger, father of Agatha—Wcher, Der Irenschutz (1822)

Cunobeline, a king of the Sil'urcs, son of Lascio'annus and father of Carnethus. Coins still exist bearing the name of "Cunobeline," and the word "Camalodunum" [Colchester], the capital of his kingdom. The Roman general between A.D. 43 and 47 was Aulus Plautius, but in 47 Ostorius Scapula took Carnethus prisoner.

Some think Cunobeline is Shakespeare's "Cymbeline," who reigned from B.C. 8 to A.D. 27, but Cymbeline's father was Ienautius or Ienurinus, his sons Gunderius and Arviragus, and the Roman general was Caius Iulius.

the courageous sons of our Cimbeline
Sank under Iulian's sword.
Dryden Colchester III (181)

Cunstance or Constance (See CURTAIN)

Cupar Justice, hang first, and try afterwards (Same as "Jedbury Justice")

Cupid and Psyche [Sí' ky], an episode in The Golden Ass of Apuleius. The allegory represents Cupid in love with Ischê. He visited her every evening, and left at sunrise, but strictly enjoined her not to attempt to discover who he was. One night curiosity overcame her prudence, and going to look upon her lover a drop of hot oil fell on his shoulder, awoke him, and he fled. Ischê now wandered in search of the lost one, but was persecuted by Venus with relentless cruelty. Having suffered almost to the death, Cupid at length married her, and she became immortal. Mrs. Litch has a poem on the subject, Wm. Morris has poetized the same in his Earthly Paradise ("May"), Lafontaine has a poem called Psyche, in imitation of the episode of Apuleius, and Molière has dramatized the subject.

* * Woman's ideal of love must not be subjected to too strong a light, or it will flee away, and the woman will suffer long years of torment. At length truth will correct her exaggerated notions, and love will reside with her for the rest of her life.

Cupid's Jack-o'-Lantern, the object of an affair of gallantry. Bob Acres says

Sir I have followed Cupid's Jack-o-Lantern and find myself in a quagmire at last.—Sheridan The Rivals III. 4 (11.70)

Cu'pidon (Jean). Count d'Orsay was so called by lord Byron (1798-1852). The count's father was styled Le Beau d'Orsay.

Cur'an, a courtier in Shakespeare's tragedy of King Lear (1605)

Curé de Meudon, Rabelais, who was first a monk, then a leech, then prebendary of St. Maur, and lastly curé of Meudon (1483-1553)

Cur'io, a gentleman attending on the duke of Illyria—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night (1614)

Curio. So Akenside calls Mr. Pulteney, and styles him "the betrayer of his country," alluding to the great statesman's change of politics. Curio was a young Roman senator, at one time the avowed enemy of Cæsar, but subsequently of Cæsar's party, and one of the victims of the civil war.

Is this the man in freedom's cause approved
The man so great, so honoured, so beloved
This Curio, hated now and scorned by all
Who fell himself to work his country's fall?
Akenside Epistle to Curio

Curious Impertinent (The), a tale introduced by Cervantes in his Don Quixote. The "impertinent" is an Italian gentleman who is silly enough to make trial of his wife's fidelity by persuading a friend to storm it if he can. Of course his friend "takes the fort," and the fool is left to bewail his own folly.—Pt. I. iv. 5 (1605)

Currer Bell, the rom. de plume of Charlotte Brontë, author of Jane Eyre [An] (1816-1850)

Curtain Painted. Parrhasius painted a curtain so wonderfully well that even Zeuxis, the rival artist, thought it was real, and bade him draw his drapery aside and show his picture. The painting of Zeuxis was a bunch of grapes so true to nature that the birds came to peck at the fruit. The "curtain," however, gained the prize, for though the grapes deceived the birds, the curtain deceived Zeuxis.

Curta'na, the sword of Fōward the Confessor, which had no point, and was therefore the emblem of mercy. Till the reign of Henry III the royal sword of England was so called

Put when Curtana will not do the deed
You lay the pointless clergy weapon by
And to the laws your sword of justice fly
Dryden, The Hind and the Panther II. (1637).

Curta'na or Courtain, the sword of Ogier the Dane

He [Ogier] drew Co[rta]in his sword out of its sheath
W. Morris Earthly Paradise 634.

Curt-Hose (2 syl.), Robert II dnc de Normandie (1087-1131)

Curt-Mantle, Henry II of England (1133, 1154-1189). So called because he wore the Anjou mantle, which was shorter than the robe worn by his predecessors

Curtis, one of Petruchio's servants — Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew (1594)

Curzon Street (London). So named after the ground-landlord, George Augustus Curzon, third viscount Howe

Cushla Machree (Irish), "My heart's delight"

Custance, daughter of the emperor of Rome, affianced to the sultan of Syria, who abjured his faith and consented to be baptized in order to marry her. His mother hated this apostasy, and at the wedding breakfast slew all the apostates except the bride. Her she embarked in a ship, which was set adrift, and in due time reached the British shores, where Custance was rescued by the lord-constable of Northumberland, who took her home, and placed her under the care of his wife Hermegild. Custance converted both the constable and his wife. A young knight wished to marry her, but she declined his suit, whereupon he murdered Hermegild, and then laid the bloody knife beside Custance, to make her suspected of the crime. King Alric examined the case, and soon discovered the real facts, whereupon the knight was executed, and the king married Custance. The queen-mother highly disapproved of the match, and during the absence of her son in Scotland embarked Custance and her infant boy in a ship, which was turned adrift. After floating about for five years, it was taken in tow by a Roman fleet on its return from Syria, and Custance with her son Maurice became the guests of a Roman senator. It so happened that Alric at this same time was at Rome on a pilgrimage, and encountered his wife, who returned with him to Northumberland and lived in peace and happiness the rest of her life — Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Man of Law's Tale," 1388)

Custance, a gay and rich widow, whom Ralph Roister Doister wishes to marry, but he is wholly baffled in his scheme — Nicholas Udall, Ralph Roister Doister (first English comedy, 1531)

Cute (Alderman), a "practical philosopher," resolved to put down everything. In his opinion "everything must be put down." Starvation must be put down, and so must suicide, sick mothers, babies, and poverty — C. Dickens, The Chimes (1844)

Cuthal, same as Uthul, one of the Orkneys

Cuthbert (St), a Scotch monk of the sixth century

St Cuthbert's Beads, joints of the articulated stems of encrinites, used for rosaries. So called from the legend that St Cuthbert sits at night on the rock in Holy Island, forging these "beads." The opposite rock serves him for anvil

On a rock of Lindisfarne
St. Cuthbert sits, and toils to frame
The sea born beads that bear his name.
Sir W. Scott, Marmion (1804)

St Cuthbert's Stane, a granite rock in Cumberland

St Cuthbert's Well, a spring of water close by St Cuthbert's Stane

Cuthbert Bede, the Rev Fdw Bradley, author of Herbert Green (1837)

Cutho'na, daughter of Rumar, was betrothed to Conlach, youngest son of Morni, of Mora. Not long before the espousals were to be celebrated, Toscar came from Ireland, and was hospitably entertained by Morni. On the fourth day, he saw Cuthona out hunting, and carried her off by force. Being pursued by Conlach, a fight ensued, in which both the young men fell, and Cuthona, after languishing for three days, died also — Ossian, Conlach and Cuthona

Cuthullin, son of Semo, commander of the Irish army, and regent during the minority of Cormac. His wife was Bragela, daughter of Soregan. In the poem called Tomyal, Cuthullin was defeated by Swaran king of Lochlin [Scandinavia], and being ashamed to meet Fingal, retired from the field gloomy and sad. Fingal, having utterly defeated Swaran, invited Cathullin to the banquet, and partially restored his depressed spirits. In the third year of Cormac's reign, Torlath, son of Can'tela, rebelled. Cathullin gained a complete victory over him at the lake Lego, but was mortally wounded in the pursuit by a random arrow. Cathullin was succeeded by Nathos, but the young king was soon dethroned by the rebel Cairbar, and murdered—Ossian, Fingal and The Death of Cathullin.

Cutler (Sir John), a royalist, who died 1699, reduced to the utmost poverty.

Cutler saw tenants break and houses fall,
For very want he could not build a wall.
His only daughter in a stranger's power
For very want he could not pay a dower.
A few grey hairs his reverend temples crowned
Twas very want that sold them for two pound
Cutler and Brutus dying, both exclaim,
Virtue and Wealth, what are ye but a name?
Pope Moral Essays iii (1709)

Cutpurse (Moll), Mary Frith, the heroine of Middleton's comedy called The Roaring Girl (1611). She was a woman of masculine vigour, who not unfrequently assumed man's attire. This notorious cut-purse once attacked general Fairfax on Hounslow Heath, but was arrested and sent to Newgate, she escaped, however, by bribing the turnkey, and died of dropsy at the age of 70. Nathaniel Field introduces her in his drama called Amends for Ladies (1618).

Cuttle (Captain Edward), a great friend of Solomon Gills, ship's instrument maker. Captain Cuttle had been a slipper, had a book instead of a right hand, and always wore a very bad, glazed hat. He was in the habit of quoting, and desiring those to whom he spoke "to overhaul the catechism till they found it," but, he added, "when found, make a note on." The kind-hearted seaman was very fond of Florence Dombey, and of Walter Gay, whom he called "Wal'r." When Florence left her father's roof, captain Cuttle sheltered her at the Wooden Midshipman. One of his favourite sentiments was "May we never want a friend, or a bottle to give him"—C. Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846).

Cyan'ean Rocks, the Symplegades (which see), so called from their deep greenish-blue colour.

Here are those hard rocks of trap of a greenish blue coloured with copper and hence called the Cynæan—Ovian.

Cyclades (3 syl), some twenty islands so called from the classic legend that they circled round Delos when that island was rendered stationary by the birth of Diana and Apollo.

Cyclic Poets, a series of epic poets, who wrote continuations or additions to Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, they were called "Cyclic" because they confined themselves to the cycle of the Trojan war.

AG'IAS wrote an epic on "the return of the Greeks from Troy" (n c 740).

ANCT'IOS wrote a continuation of the Iliad, describing the taking of Troy by the "Wooden Horse," and its conflagration. Virgil has copied from this poet (n c 776).

ΓΥΓΑΜΟΝ wrote a continuation of the Odyssey. It contains the adventures of Telegonos in search of his father Ulysses. When he reached Ithaca, Ulysses and Telemachos went against him, and Telegonos killed Ulysses with a spear which his mother Circe had given him (n c 568).

LES'CHIS, author of the Little Iliad, in four books, containing the fate of Ajax, the exploits of Philoctetes, Neoptolemos, and Ulysses, and the final capture of Troy (n c 708).

SIAS'IOS, "son-in-law" of Homer. He wrote an introduction to the Iliad.

Cyclops. Their names are Brontes, Steropes, and Argos (See ΣΥΜΒΑΔ, voy 3).

Cyclops (The Holy). So Dryden, in the Masque of Albion and Albanus, calls Richard Rumbold, an Englishman, the chief conspirator in the "Rye-house Plot." He had lost one eye, and was executed.

Cydippe (3 syl), a lady courted by Acontius of Cea, but being unable to obtain her, he wrote on an apple, "I swear by Diana that Acontius shall be my husband." This apple was presented to the maiden, and being persuaded that she had written the words, though inadvertently, she consented to marry Acontius for "the oath's sake."

Cydippe by a letter was betrayed
Writ on an apple to the unwary maid.
Ovid, Art of Love I.

Cyllaros, the horse of Pollux according to Virgil (Georg. iii 90), but of Castor according to Ovid (Metam. vi 403). It was coal-black, with white legs and tail.

Cylle'nus, Mercury, so called from mount Cylle'ne, in Arcadia, where he was born

Cymbeline (3 syl), mythical king of Britain for thirty-five years. He began to reign in the nineteenth year of Augustus Cæsar. His father was Penantius, who refused to pay the tribute to the Romans exacted of Cassibela after his defeat by Julius Cæsar. Cymbeline married twice. By his first wife he had a daughter named Imogen, who married Poethumus Leonatus. His second wife had a son named Cloten by a former husband—Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605)

Cymochles [Si mál' leez], brother of Pyroch'lès, son of Acratès, and husband of Acras'ia the enchantress. He sets out against sir Guyon, but being ferried over Idle Lake, abandons himself to self-indulgence, and is slain by king Arthur (canto 8)—Spenser, Faëry Queen, ii 5, etc (1590)

Cymod'oce (4 syl) The mother of Mir'nel is so called in bk iv 12 of the Idylls Queen, but in bk iii 4 she is spoken of as Cymo'ent "daughter of Ner'us" (2 syl) by an earth-born father, 'the famous Dumarin'

Cymoent. (See CymodocE)

Cym'ry, the Welsh

The Welsh always called themselves Cymry "the literal meaning of which is aborigines." It is the same word as Cimbri. They call their language Cymraeg, i.e. the primitive tongue.—E. Williams.

Cynæg'ros, brother of the poet Æschylus. When the Persians, after the battle of Marathon, were pushing off from shore, Cynæg'ros seized one of their ships with his right hand, which being lopped off, he grasped it with his left hand, this being cut off, he seized it with his teeth, and lost his life.

ADMIRAL BENVOW, in an engagement with the French, near St Martha, in 1701, had his legs and thighs shivered into splinters by chain-shot, but (supported on a wooden frame) he remained on deck till Du Casse sheered off.

AMEYNA, the Portuguese governor of India, had his legs and thighs shattered in a similar way, and caused himself to be bound to the ship's mast, that he might wave his sword to cheer on the combatants.

JAFFER, at the battle of Muta, carried the sacred banner of the prophet. One hand being lopped off, he held it with the other, this also being cut off, he held it with his two stumps, and when at last his head was cut off, he contrived to fall dead on the banner, which was thus detained till Abdallah had time to rescue it and hand it to Khalid.

Cyne'tha (3 syl), eldest son of Cadwallon (king of North Wales). He was an orphan, brought up by his uncle Owen. During his minority, Owen and Cynetha loved each other dearly, but when the orphan came of age and claimed his inheritance, his uncle burnt his eyes out by exposing them to plates of hot brass. Cynetha and his son Cadwallon accompanied Madoc to North America, where the blind old man died while Madoc was in Wales preparing for his second voyage.—Southey, Madoc, i 3 (1805)

Cadwallon's erat primævus jure Cynetha
Proh pudor! hunc oculis patris præstitit Oeris
The Pentateuch

Cynic Tub (The), Diog'enes, who lived in a tub, and was a cynic philosopher.

[The] teach their doctrines from the Cynic tub
Milton Comus, 703 (1634)

Cynosure (3 syl), the pole-star. The word means "the dog's tail," and is used to signify a guiding genius, or the observed of all observers. Cynosura was an Idæan nymph, one of the nurses of Zeus (1 syl).

Some gentle taper
Tho' a rich candle, from the wicker he a
Of some clay habitant in vilds
With thy long level ed side of streaming light,
And thou shalt be our star of Arctus
Or Tynan cynosure

Cyn'thia, the moon or Diana, who was born on mount Cynthus, in Dêlos. Apollo is called "Cynthus."

watching, in the night,
Beneath pale Cynthia's melancholy light,
Falconer The Snipecock, iii 2 (1755)

Cyn'thia. So Spenser, in Colin Clouts Come Home Again, calls queen Elizabeth, "whose angel's eye was his life's sole bliss, his heart's eternal treasure. P. Fletcher, in The Purple Island, iii, also calls queen Elizabeth "Cyn'thia."

Her words were like a stream of honey feeding
Her deed were like great clusters of ripe grapes
Her looks were like beams of the morning sun
Forth I went, thro' the wind sea of the east
Her thou his were like the fumes of frankincense
Which from a golden censer forth loth rose
Spenser Colin Clouts Come Home Again (1593)

Cyn'thia, daughter of sir Paul Pliant, and daughter-in-law of Idris Pliant. She is in love with Mellefont (2 syl). Sir

Paul calls her "Thy"—W Congreve,

Daffodil When Perseph'one, the daughter of Deme'ter, was a little maiden, she wandered about the meadows of I'naa, in Sicily, to gather white daffodils to wreath into her hair, and being tired she fell asleep Pluto, the god of the infernal regions, carried her off to become his wife, and his touch turned the white flowers to a golden yellow Some remained in her tresses till she reached the meadows of Acheron, and falling off there grew into the asphodel, with which the meadows thenceforth abounded

She stepped upon Sicilian grass,
Demeter's daughter, fresh and fair
A child of light a radiant lass
And gave mine as the morning air
The daffodils were fair to see
They nod tell, truly on the lea

Daphnis and Chloë, a pastoral love story in Greek, by Longos (a Byzantine), not unlike the tale of The Gentle Shepherd, by Allan Ramsay Gessner has also imitated the Greek romance in his idyll called Daphnis In this love story Longos says he was hunting in Lesbos, and saw in a grove consecrated to the nymphs a beautiful picture of children exposed, lovers plighting their faith, and the incursions of pirates, which he now expresses and dedicates to Pan, Cupid, and the nymphs Daphnis, of course, is the lover of Chloë (Probably this Greek pastoral story suggested to St Pierre his story of Paul and Virginia Gay has a poem entitled Daphnis and Chloë)

Dapper, a lawyers clerk, who went to subtle "the alchemist," to be supplied with "a familiar" to make him win in horse-racing, cards, and all games of chance Dapper is told to prepare himself for an interview with the fairy queen by taking "three drops of vinegar in at the nose, two at the mouth, and one at either ear," "to cry hum thrice and buzz as often" — Ben Jonson, The Alchemist (1610)

Darwin's Missing Link, the link between the monkey and man According to Darwin, the present host of animal life began from a few elemental forms, which developed, and by natural selection propagated certain types of animals, while others less suited to the battle of life died out Thus, beginning with the larvæ of ascidians (a marine mollusc), we get by development to fish lowly organized (as the lancelet), thence to ganoids and other fish, then to amphibians From amphibians we get to birds and reptiles, and thence to mammals, among which comes the monkey, between which and man is a MISSING LINK

Alas! I see no men nowadays comparable to those I knew heretofore and the tournaments are not performed with half the magnificence as when I was a young man Seeing some fine peaches served up he observed In my time the peaches were much larger than they are at present, nature degenerates every day

"At that rate," said his companion snilling the peaches of Adam's time must have been wonderfully large"—Lesage, Old Blue iv 7 (17-18)

Daughter (The), a drama by S. Knowles (1836) Marian, "daughter" of Robert, once a wrecker, was betrothed to Edward, a sailor, who went on his last voyage, and intended then to marry her. During his absence a storm at sea arose, a boat was washed ashore, and Robert went down to plunder it. Marian went to look for her father and prevent his robbing those washed ashore by the waves, when she saw in the dusk some one stab a wrecked body. It was Black Norris, but she thought it was her father. Robert being taken up, Marian gave witness against him, and he was condemned to death. Norris said he would save her father if she would marry him, and to this she consented, but on the wedding day Edward returned. Norris was taken up for murder, and Marian was saved.

Daughter with Her Murdered Father's Head Margaret Roper, daughter of sir Thomas More, obtained privately the head of her father, which had been exposed on London Bridge, enclosed it in a casket, and at death was buried with the casket in her arms. Fennyson says—

More broadened on the borders of the dark
 Ere I saw her who clasp'd in her last trance
 Her murdered father's head

The head of the young earl of Derwentwater was exposed on Temple Bar in 1716. His wife drove in a cart under the arch, and a man, hired for the purpose, threw the young earl's head into the cart, that it might be decently buried.—Sir Bernard Burke

Middle de Sombreuil, daughter of the comte de Sombreuil, insisted on sharing her father's prison during the "Reign of Terror," and in accompanying him to the guillotine.

Dauphin (Le Grand), Louis duc de Bourgogne, eldest son of Louis XIV, for whom was published the Delphin Classics (1661-1711)

Dauphin (Le Petit), son of the "Grand Dauphin" (1682-1712)

Daura, daughter of Armar. She was betrothed to Armar, son of Armar, Erath a rival lover having been rejected by her. One day, disguised as an old grey-beard, Erath told Daura that he was sent to conduct her to Armar, who was waiting for her. Without the slightest suspicion, she followed her guide, who took her to a rock in the midst of the sea, and there left her. Her brother Arndal, returning from the chase, saw Erath on the shore, and bound him to an oak, then pushing off the boat, went to fetch back his sister. At this crisis Armar came up, and discharged his arrow at Erath, but the arrow struck Arndal, and killed him. "The boat broke in twain," and Armar plunged into the sea to rescue his betrothed, but a "sudden blast from the hills struck him, and he sank to rise no more." Daura was rescued by her father, but she haunted the shore all night in a dreaching rain. Next day "her voice grew very feeble, it died away, and, spent with grief, she expired"—Ossian, Songs of Selma Davenant (Lord), a bigamist. One wife was Marianno Dormer, whom he forsook in three months. It was given out that he was dead, and Marianne in time married lord Davenant's son. His other wife was Louisa Travers, who was engaged to captain Dormer, but was told that the captain was faithless and had married another. When the villainy of his lordship could be no longer concealed, he destroyed himself.

Lady Davenant, one of the two wives of lord Davenant. She was "a faultless wife," with beauty to attract affection, and every womanly grace.

Charles Davenant, a son of lord Davenant, who married Marianne Dormer, his father's wife.—Cumberland, The Mysterious Husband (1783)

Davenant (Will), a supposed descendant from Shakespeare, and Wildrake's friend.—Sir W. Scott, Woodstock (time, the Commonwealth)

David, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Charles II. As David's beloved son Absalom rebelled against him, so the duke of Monmouth rebelled against his father Charles II. As Achitophel was a traitorous counsellor to David, so was the earl of Shaftesbury to Charles II. As Hushai outwitted Achitophel, so Hyde (duke of Rochester) outwitted the earl of Shaftesbury, etc., etc.

David, king of North Wales, eldest son of Owen, by his second wife Owen died in 1169. David married Emma Plantagenet, a Savon princess. He slew his brother Hoel and his half-brother Yorwerth (son of Owen by his first wife), who had been set aside from the succession in consequence of a blemish in the face. He also imprisoned his brother Rodri, and drove others into exile. Madoc, one of his brothers, went to America, and established there a Welsh colony — Southey, Madoc (1805).

David (St), son of Xantus prince of Ceretieu (Cardiganshire) and the nun Malearia. He was the uncle of King Arthur. St David first embraced the ascetic life in the Isle of Wight, but subsequently removed to Menevia, in Pembrolshire, where he founded twelve convents. In 577 the archbishop of Clerleon resigned his see to him, and St David removed the seat of it to Menevia, which was subsequently called St David's, and became the metropolis of Wales. He died at the age of 146, in the year 642. The waters of Bath "owe their warmth and salutary qualities to the benediction of this saint." Drayton says he lived in the valley of Ewias (2 syl), between the hills of Hatteril, in Monmouthshire.

Here in an aged cell with moss and ivy grown
In which not to this day the sun hath ever shone
That reverend British saint in zealous ages past,
To contemplation lived.

Poet, Johnson iv (1612)

St David's Day, March 1. The leek worn by Welshmen on this day is in memory of a complete victory obtained by them over the Saxons (March 1, 640). This victory is ascribed "to the prayers of St David," and his judicious adoption of a leek in the cap, that the Britons might readily recognize each other. The Saxons, having no badge not unfrequently turned their swords against their own supporters.

David and Jonathan, inseparable friends. The allusion is to David the psalmist and Jonathan the son of Saul. David's lamentation at the death of Jonathan was never surpassed in pathos and beauty — 2 Samuel i 19-27.

Davie Debet, debt.

So ofte thy neighbours banquet in thy hall
Till Davie Debet in thy cellar stand
And bids thee welcome to thine own decay
G Gascogne Magnum i cct/jal etc (died 1775)

Davie of Stenhouse, a friend of Hobbes Fihott — Sir W Scott, The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Davies (John), an old fisherman employed by Joshua Geddes the quaker — Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III).

Da'vus, a plain, uncomely servant, a common name for a slave in Greek and Roman plays, as in the Andria of Terence.

His face made of brass like a vice in a grane
His gesture like Davus whom Terence doth name
T Talscr Five Hundred i cct/jal of Good Husbandry iv (1557)

Davus sum, non Oedipus. I am a homely man, and do not understand hints, innuendoes, and riddles, like Oedipus. Oedipus was the Theban who expounded the riddle of the Sphinx, that puzzled all his countrymen. Davus was the stock name of a servant or slave in Latin comedies. The proverb is used by Terence, Andria, 1, 2, 23.

Davy, the varlet of justice Shallow, who so identifies himself with his master that he considers himself half host half varlet. Thus when he seats Bardolph and Page at table, he tells them they must take "his" good will for their assurance of welcome — Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV (1598).

Daw (Sir David), a rich, dunder-headed baronet of Monmouthshire, without wit, words, or worth, but believing himself somebody, and fancying himself a sharp fellow, because his servants laugh at his good sayings, and his mother calls him a wag. Sir David pays his suit to Miss [milk] Tempest, but as the affections of the young lady are fixed on Henry Woodville, the baron goes to the wall — Cumberland, The Wheel of Fortune (1779).

Dawfyd, "the one-eyed" freebooter chief — Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II).

Dawkins (Jack), known by the sobriquet of the "Artful Dodger." He is one of Fagin's tools. Jack Dawkins is a young scamp of unmitigated villainy, and full of artifices, but of a cheery, buoyant temper — C Dickens, Oliver Twist, viii (1837).

Dawson (Bully), a London sharper, bully, and debauchee of the seventeenth century — See Spectator, No 2.

Bully Dawson kicked by half the town and half the town kicked by Bully Dawson — Charles Lamb.

Dawson (Jemmy). Captain James Dawson was one of the eight officers belonging to the Manchester volunteers in the service of Charles Edward, the young pretender. He was a very amiable young man, engaged to a young lady of family and fortune, who went in her carriage to witness his execution for treason. When the body was drawn, e e embowelled, and the heart thrown into the fire, she exclaimed, "James Dawson!" and expired. Shenstone has made this the subject of a graphic ballad.

Young Dawson was a gallant youth
A brighter never trod the fatal
And well he loved one charming maid
And dearly was he loved again.
Shenstone Jenny Dawson

Dawson (Phæbe), "the pride of Lammas Fair," courted by all the smartest young men of the village, but caught "by the sparkling eyes" and ardent words of a tailor. Phæbe had by him a child before marriage, and after marriage he turned a "captious tyrant and a noisy sot." Poor Phæbe drooped, "pinched were her looks, as one who pined for bread," and in want and sickness she sank into an early tomb.

This sketch is one of the best in Crabbe's Parish Register (1807).

Day (Justice), a pitiable hen-pecked husband, who always addresses his wife as "duck" or "duckie."

Mrs. Day, wife of the "justice," full of vulgar dignity, overbearing, and loud. She was formerly the kitchen-maid of her husband's father, but being rured from the kitchen to the parlour, became his lady paramount.

In the comedy from which this farce is taken, "Mrs. Day" was the kitchen-maid in the family of colonel Careless, and went by the name of Gillian. In her exalted state she insisted on being addressed as "your honour" or "your ladyship."

"Mrs. Day" by drawing in the tawdry habiliments and vulgar manners of an old hypocritical city squire. — Thomas Davies.

Abel Day, a puritanical prig, who can do nothing without Obadiah. This "downright ass" (act 1) aspires to the hand of the heiress Arabella — 1 Knight, The Honest Thieves.

This farce is a mere réchauffé of The Committee, a comedy by the Hon. Sir R. Howard (1670). The names of "Day," "Obadiah," and "Arabella" are the same.

Day (Furquhard), the absentee from the clan Chattan ranks at the conflict —

Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.)

Day of the Barricades, May 12, 1888, when Henri de Guise returned to Paris in defiance of the king's order. The king sent for his Swiss guards, and the Parisians tore up the pavements, threw chains across the streets, and piled up barrels filled with earth and stones, behind which they shot down the Swiss as they paraded the streets. The king begged the duke to put an end to the conflict, and fled.

Another Journée des Barricades was August 27, 1688, the commencement of the 1^{re} ronde war.

Another was June 27, 1830, the first day of the grand sémou which drove Charles X. from the throne.

Another was February 21, 1818, when Afre, archbishop of Paris, was shot in his attempt to quell the insurrection.

Another was December 2, 1811, the day of the coup d'état, when Louis Napoleon made his appeal to the people for re-election to the presidency for ten years.

Day of the Cornsacks (Journée des Moines), January 3, 1591, when some of the partizans of Henri IV., disguised as millers, attempted to get possession of the barrier de St. Honore (Paris), with the view of making themselves masters of the city. In this they failed.

Day of the Dupes, November 11, 1630. The dupes were Marie de Mediers, Anne of Austria, and Gaston due d'Orléans, who were outwitted by cardinal Richelieu. The plotters had induced Louis XIII. to dismiss his obnoxious minister, whereupon the cardinal went at once to resign the seals of office, tho' long repented, re-established the cardinal, and he became more powerful than ever.

Days Recurrent in the Lives of Great Men.

BECKET Tuesday was Becket's day. He was born on a Tuesday, and on a Tuesday was assassinated. He was baptized on a Tuesday, took his flight from Northampton on a Tuesday, withdrew to France on a Tuesday, had his vision of martyrdom on a Tuesday, returned to England on a Tuesday, his body was removed from the crypt to the shrine on a Tuesday, and on Tuesday (April 13, 1875) cardinal Manning consecrated the new church dedicated to St. Thomas a Becket.

CROWWELL's day was September 3. On September 3, 1650, he won the battle of Dunbar, on September 8, 1651, he won the battle of Worcester, on September 3, 1658, he died.

HAROLD's day was October 14. It was his birthday, and also the day of his death. William the Conqueror was born on the same day, and, on October 14, 1066, won England by conquest.

NAPOLEON's day was August 15, his birthday, but his "lucky" day, like that of his nephew, Napoleon III, was the 2nd of the month. He was made consul for life on August 2, 1802, was crowned December 2, 1804, won his greatest battle, that of Austerlitz, for which he obtained the title of "Great," December 2, 1805, married the archduchess of Austria April 2, 1810, etc.

NAPOLEON III The coup d'état was December 2, 1851. Louis Napoleon was made emperor December 2, 1852, he opened, at Saarbrück, the Franco-German war August 2, 1870, and surrendered his sword to William of Prussia, September 2, 1870.

Dazzle, in London Assurance, by D. Boucicault.

"Dazzle" and "Idly Gay Spanker" act themselves "and will never be dropped out of the list of acting plays" —Perry Fitzgerald.

De Courcy, in a romance called Women, by the Rev. C. R. Maturin. An Irishman, made up of contradictions and improbabilities. He is in love with Zaira, a brilliant Italian, and also with her unknown daughter, called Eva Wentworth, a model of purity. Both women are blighted by his inconstancy. Eva dies, but Zaira lives to see De Courcy perish of remorse (1822).

De Gard, a noble, staid gentleman, newly lighted from his travels, brother of Orina, who "chases" Mirabel "the wild goose," and catches him —Beaumont and Fletcher, The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

De L'Épée (Abbé). Seeing a deaf and dumb lad abandoned in the streets of Paris, he rescues him, and brings him up under the name of Theodore. The foundling turns out to be Julio count of Harancour.

In your opinion who is the greatest genius that France has ever produced? Science would decide for D'Alembert, and Nature (should) say Buffon. Wit and Taste (should) present Voltaire, and Sentiment plead for Rousseau, but Genius and Humanity cry out for De L'Épée, and him I call the best and greatest of human creatures. —Th. Holcroft, The Deaf and Dumb, ill. 2 (1785).

De Profundis ("out of the depths"), the first two words of Psalm exxxv in the Roman Catholic Liturgy, sung when the dead are committed to the grave.

"Find Girl."

De Valmont (Count), father of Florina and uncle of Geraldine. During his absence in the wars, he left his kinsman, the baron Longueville, guardian of his castle, but under the hope of coming into the property, the baron set fire to the castle, intending thereby to kill the wife and her infant boy. When De Valmont returned and knew his losses, he became a wild, reclusive, querulous, despondent, frantic at times, and at times most melancholy. He adopted an infant "found in a forest," who turned out to be his son. His wife was ultimately found, and the villainy of Longueville was brought to light. —W. Diamond, The Foundling of the Forest.

Many De Valmonts? I have witnessed in fifty-four years, but have never seen the equal of Joseph George Holman (1764-1811). —Donaldson.

Deaf and Dumb (The), a comedy by Thomas Holcroft. "The deaf and dumb" boy is Julio count of Harancour, a ward of M. Darlemont, who, in order to get possession of his ward's property, abandons him when very young in the streets of Paris. Here he is rescued by the abbé De l'Épée, who brings him up under the name of Theodore. The boy being recognized by his old nurse and others, Darlemont confesses his crime, and Julio is restored to his rank and inheritance. —Th. Holcroft, The Deaf and Dumb (1785).

Dean of St Patrick (The), Jonathan Swift, who was appointed to the deanery in 1713, and retained it till his death (1667-1745).

Deans (Douce Davie), the cowherd at Edinburgh, noted for his religious peculiarities, his magnanimity in affection, and his eccentricities.

Mistress Rebecca Deans, Douce Davie's second wife.

Jeane Deans, daughter of Douce Davie Deans, by his first wife. She marries Reuben Butler, the presbyterian minister Jeanie Deans is a model of good sense, strong affection, resolution, and disinterestedness. Her journey from Edinburgh to London is as interesting as that of Elizabeth from Siberia to Moscow, or of Bunyan as a pilgrim.

Effie [Luphemina] Deans, daughter of Douce Davie Deans, by his second wife. She is betrayed by George [afterwards sir George] Staunton (called Geordie Robertson), and imprisoned for child murder. Jeanie goes to the queen and begs for pardon, which is vouchsafed to her, and Staunton does what he can to repair the mischief he has done by marrying Effie, who thus becomes lady Staunton. Soon after this sir George is shot by a gipsy boy, who proves to be his own son, and Effie retires to a convent on the Continent.—Sir W. Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.)

* * J. E. Millais has a picture of Effie Deans keeping tryst with George Staunton.

* * The prototype of Jeanie Deans was Helen Walker, to whose memory sir W. Scott erected a tombstone in Irongray Churchyard (Kirkeudbright).

Death of Mors. So Tennyson calls sir Ironside the Red Knight of the Red Lands, who kept Lyones (or Liones) captive in Castle Perilous. The name "Mors," which is Latin, is very inconsistent with a purely British tale, and of course does not appear in the original story.—Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lyonesse"), sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 131-137 (1470).

Death (The Ferry of). The ferry of the Irish, leading to Siberia, is so called because it leads the Russian exile to political and almost certain physical death. To be "land on the shelf" is to cross the ferry of the Irish.

Death from Strange Causes

Ascanius was killed by the fall of a tortoise on his head from the claws of an eagle in the air.—Pliny, Hist. vii 7.

Agathocles (4 syl), tyrant of Sicily, was killed by a tooth-pick, at the age of 95.

Avicenna was choked by a grape-stone.—Pliny, Hist. vii 7.

Bissus (O. Lecanus) died from the prick of a fine needle in his left thumb.

Chaiyas, the soothsayer, died of laughter at the thought of his having outlived the time predicted for his death.

Charles VIII., conducting his queen into a tennis-court, struck his head against the lintel, and it caused his death.

Fabius, the Roman prætor, was choked by a single goat-hair in the milk which he was drinking.—Pliny, Hist. vii 7.

Friedrick Lewis, prince of Wales, died from the blow of a cricket-ball.

Isadach died of thirst in the harvest-field, because (in observance of the rule of St. Patrick) he refused to drink a drop of anything.

Louis VI met with his death from a pig running under his horse, and causing it to stumble.

Marcus died of laughter on seeing a monkey trying to pull on a pair of his boots.

Philonoxenus (4 syl) died of laughter at seeing an ass eating the figs provided for his own dessert.—Valerius Maximus.

Placut (Phillipot) dropped down dead while in the act of prying a bill.—Bacchery the elder.

Quenault, a Norman physician of Montpellier, died from the slight wound made in his hand in the extraction of a splinter.

Saurius (Spirius) was choked supping up the albumen of a soft-boiled egg.

Zivus, the painter, died of laughter at sight of a hog which he had just depicted.

Death Proof of Guilt. When combats and ordeals were appealed to in proof of guilt, in the belief that "God would defend the right, the death of the combatant was his sentence of guilt also.

Take hence that traitor from our sight,
For by his death we do perceive his guilt.
Shakespeare 2 Henry VI act II. sc. 3 (1591)

Death Ride (The), the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava, October 25, 1854. In this action 600 English horsemen, under the command of the earl of Cardigan, charged a Russian force of 5000 cavalry and six batallions of infantry. They galloped through the battery of thirty guns, cutting down the artillervmen, and through the cavalry, but then discovered the battalions, and cut their way back again. Of the 670 who advanced to this daring charge, not 200 returned. This reckless exploit was the result of some misunderstanding in an order from the commander-in-chief. Tennyson has a poem on the subject, called The Charge of the Light Brigade.

For chivalrous devotion and daring the "Death Ride" of the Light Brigade will not easily be paralleled.—Sir Edw. Greasy, The Fifteen Decisive Battles (preface).

Debatable Land (The), a tract of land between the Firth and the Sark. It seems properly to belong to Scotland, but having been claimed by both crowns was styled The Debatable Land Sir Richard Graham bought of James I of England a lease of this tract, and got it united to the county of Cumberland. As James ruled over both kingdoms, he was supremely indifferent to which the plot was annexed.

Deb'on, one of the companions of Brute. According to British fable, Devonshire is a corruption of "Debon's-share," or the share of country assigned to Debon.

Deborah Debbitch, governess to lady Peveril's—Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.)

Dec'adi, plu dec'adis, the holiday every tenth day, in substitution of the Sunday or sabbath, in the first French Revolution.

All attend to labours in the corner of the Augustin cloister and he calls that his holiday—The Acher du 1er U.

Decem Scriptores, a collection of ten ancient chronicles on English history, edited by Tysden and John Selden. The names of the chroniclers are Simeon of Durham, John of Hexham, Richard of Hexham, Ailred of Rievall, Ralph de Diceto, John Brompton of Jorinal, Gervase of Canterbury, Thomas Stubbs, William Thorn of Canterbury, and Henry Knighton of Leicester.

De'cius, friend of Antinous (4 syl.)—Beaumont and Fletcher, Laus of Candy (1617).

Decree of Fontainebleau, an edict of Napoleon I., ordering the destruction by fire of all English goods (dated October 18, 1810, from Fontainebleau).

Decuman Gate, one of the four gates in a Roman camp. It was the gate opposite the praetorian, and furthest from the enemy. Called decuman because the tenth legion was always posted near it. The other two gates (the porta principalis dextra and the porta principalis sinistra) were on the other sides of the square. If the praetorian gate was at the top of this page, the decuman gate would be at the bottom, the porta dextra on the right hand, and the porta sinistra on the left.

Dedlock (Sir Leicester), bart, who has a general opinion that the world might get on without hills, but would be "totally done up" without Dedlocks. He loves lady Dedlock, and believes in her implicitly. Sir Leicester is honourable and truthful, but intensely prejudiced, immovably obstinate, and proud as "county" can make a man, but his pride has a most dreadful fall when the guilt of lady Dedlock becomes known.

Lady Dedlock, wife of sir Leicester, beautiful, cold, and apparently heartless; but she is weighed down with this terrible secret, that before marriage she had had a daughter by captain Hawdon. This daughter's name is Esther [Summerson] the heroine of the novel.

Voluntia Dedlock, cousin of sir Leicester. A "young" lady of 60, given to rouge, pearl-powder, and cosmetics. She has a habit of prying into the concerns of others—C Dickens, Great House (1853).

Dee's Speculum, a mirror, which Dr John Dee asserted was brought to him by the angels Raphael and Gabriel. At the death of the doctor it passed into the possession of the earl of Peterborough, at Drayton, then to lady Betty Germaine, by whom it was given to John last duke of Argyll. The duke's grandson (lord Frederic Campbell) gave it to Horace Walpole, and in 1812 it was sold, at the dispersion of the curiosities of Strawberry Hill, and bought by Mr Smythe Pigott. At the sale of Mr. Pigott's library, in 1833, it passed into the possession of the late lord Londesborough. A writer in Notes and Queries (p 376, November 7, 1871) says, it "has now been for many years in the British Museum," where he saw it "some eighteen years ago."

This magic speculum is a flat polished mineral, like cannot coil, of a circular form, fitted with a handle.

Deerslayer (The), the title of a novel by J F Cooper, and the nickname of its hero (Natty Bumppo), a model uncivilized man, honourable, truthful, and brave, pure of heart and without reproach. He is introduced in five of Cooper's novels: The Deerslayer, The Pathfinder, The Last of the Mohicans, The Pioneers, and The Prairie. He is called "Hawk-eye" in The Last of the Mohicans, "Leather-stocking" in The Pioneers, and "The Trapper" in The Prairie, in which he dies.

Defarge (Mons), keeper of a wine shop in the faubourge St Antoine, in Paris. He is a bull-necked, good-humoured, but implacable-looking man.

Mde Defarge, his wife, a dangerous woman, with great force of character, everlastingly knitting.

Mde Defarge had a watery eye that seldom seemed to look at anything.—C Dickens, A Tale of Two Cities (1859).

Defender of the Faith, the title first given to Henry VIII by pope Leo X, for a volume against Luther, in defence of pardons, the papacy, and the seven sacraments. The original volume is in the Vatican, and contains this inscription in the king's handwriting: Anglorum rex Henricus, Leonis A militis hoc opus et fidei testem et amicitiae, whereupon the pope (in the twelfth year of his reign) conferred upon Henry, by bull, the title "Fidei Defensor," and commanded all Christians so to address him. The original bull was preserved by sir Robert Cotton, and is signed by the pope, four bishop-cardinals, fifteen priest-cardinals, and eight deacon-cardinals. A complete copy of the bull, with its seals and signatures, may be seen in Selden's Titles of Honour, v 53-57 (1672)

Defensætas, Devonshire

Defoe writes The History of the Plague of London as if he had been a personal spectator, but he was only three years old at the time (1663-1731)

Deggial, antichrist. The Mohammedan writers say he has but one eye and one eyebrow, and on his forehead is written CAFER ("infidel")

Chilled with terror we concluded that the Deggial, with his exterminating angels had sent forth their plagues on the earth.—W. Beckford Ivories (1784)

Deheubarth, South Wales.—Spenser, Fairy Queen, III 2 (1590)

Deird'ri, an ancient Irish story similar to the Dar-Thula of Ossian. Conor, king of Ulster, puts to death by treachery the three sons of Usnach. This leads to the desolating war against Ulster, which terminates in the total destruction of Emain. This is one of the three tragic stories of the Irish, which are (1) The death of the children of Touran (regarding Tuatha de Danans), (2) the death of the children of Lear or Lir, turned into swans by Aoife, (3) the death of the children of Usnach (a "Milesian" story)

Dek'abrist, a Decembrist, from Dekaber, the Russian for December. It denotes those persons who suffered death or captivity for the part they took in the military conspiracy which broke out in St. Petersburg in December, 1825, on the accession of czar Nicholas to the throne

Dela'da, the tooth of Buddha, preserved in the Malegawa temple at Kandy. The natives guard it with the greatest jealousy, from a belief that whoever possesses it acquires the right to govern Ceylon. When the English (in 1815) obtained possession of this palladium, the natives submitted without resistance

Delaserre (Captain Philip), a friend of Harry Bertram.—Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Delectable Mountains, a range of hills from the summits of which the Celestial City could be seen. These mountains were beautiful with woods, vineyards, fruits of all sorts, flowers, springs and fountains, etc.

Now there were on the tops of these mountains shepherds feeding their flocks. The pilgrims therefore went to them and leaning on their staffs they asked,

Della Crusca School, originally applied in 182 to a society in Florence, established to purify the national language and sift from it all its impurities, but applied in England to a brotherhood of poets (at the close of the last century) under the leadership of Mr. Piozzi. This school was conspicuous for affectation and high-flown panegyrics on each other. It was stamped out by Gifford, in The Bards, in 1794, and The Mockers, in 1796. Robert Merry, who signed himself Della Crusca, James Cobb a free-writer, James Boswell (biographer of Dr. Johnson), O'Keefe, Morton, Reynolds, Holcroft, Sheridan, Colman the younger, Mrs. H. Cowley, and Mrs. Robinson were its best exponents.

Delphin Classics (The), a set of Latin classics edited in France for the use of the grand dauphin (son of Louis XIV.) Huet was chief editor, assisted by Mantauzier and Bossuet. They had thirty-nine scholars working under them. The indexes of these classics are very valuable.

Delphine (2 syl.), the heroine and title of a novel by Mme de Stael. Delphine is a charming character, who has a faithless lover, and dies of a broken heart. This novel, like Corinne, was written during her banishment from France by Napoleon I., when she travelled in Switzerland and Italy. It is generally thought that "Delphine" was meant for the authoress herself (1802).

Delta [Δ] of Blackwood is D. M. Moir (1738-1831).

Del'ville (2 syl.), one of the guardians of Cecilia. He is a man of wealth and great ostentation, with a haughty humours and condescending pride, especially in his intercourse with his social inferiors. —Miss Burney, Cecilia (1782).

Demands. In full of all demands, as his lordship says. His "lordship" is the marquis of Blandford, and the allusion is to Mr. Benson, the jeweller, who sent in a claim to the marquis for interest to a bill which had run more than twelve months. His lordship sent a cheque for the bill itself, and wrote on it, "In full of all demands." Mr. Benson accepted the bill, and sued for the interest, but was non-suited (1871).

Demetria, South Wales, the inhabitants are called Demetrius.

Demetrius the son of the Demetrian King.
Draughts Demetrius, 1861.

Demetrius, a young Athenian, to whom Igeus (3 syl) promised his daughter Hermia in marriage. As Hermia loved Lysander, she refused to marry Demetrius, and fled from Athens with Lysander. Demetrius went in quest of her, and was followed by Helena, who doted on him. All four fell asleep, and "dreamed a dream" about the fairies. On waking, Demetrius became more reasonable. He saw that Hermia disliked him, but that Helena loved him sincerely, so he consented to forego the one and take to wife the other. When Lysander, the father of Hermia, found out how the case stood, he consented to the union of his daughter with Lysander. —Shakespeare, A Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Demetrius, in The Poetaster, by Ben Jonson, is meant for John Marston (died 1633).

Demetrius (1 syl), son of king Antigonus, in love with Celina, alias Lionel. —Beaumont and Fletcher, The Humours of a Lieutenant (1647).

Demetrius, a citizen of Greece during the reign of Alexius Comnenus. —Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Demurgus, that mysterious agent which, according to Plato, made the world and all that it contains. The Logos or "Word" of St. John's Gospel (ch. 1) is the demurgus of platonizing Christians.

Democritus (in Latin Democritus), the laughing or scoffing philosopher, the first Baron of his age. To "dine with Democritus" is to go without dinner, the same as "dining with Duke Humphrey," or "dining with the cross-legged knights."

People think that we [authors] often dine with Democritus, but there they are all taken. There is not one of the fraternity who is not welcome to some good table. —Letter on Puff (1722).

Democritus Junior, Robert Burton, author of The Anatomy of Melancholy (1576-1640).

Demodocus (in Latin Demodocus), bard of Alen'ous (1 syl) king of the Phæacians.

Such as the wise Demodocus once told
In an evening at king Alen'ous' fe-
While we 11th of 11th and all the rest
Are held with his me all his harm my Dem'ogor'gon, tyrant of the elves.

and fury, whose very name inspired terror, hence Milton speaks of "the dreaded name of Demogorgon" (Paradise Lost, ii 965). Spencer says he "dwells in the deep abyss where the three fatal sisters dwell" (Fairy Queen, iv 2), but Ariosto says he inhabited a splendid palace on the Himalaya Mountains. Mentioned by Statius in the Thebaid, iv 516. Shelley so calls eternity in Prometheus Unbound.

He is the first begotten of Beelzebub with a face as terrible as Demogorgon—Dryden: The Spanish Fryar v. (1680).

Demoph'oôn (4 syl) was brought up by Demeter, who anointed him with ambrosia and plunged him every night into the fire. One day, his mother, out of curiosity, watched the proceeding, and was horror-struck, whereupon Demeter told her that her foolish curiosity had robbed her son of immortal youth.

* * This story is also told of Isis—Plutarch, De Isid et Osirid, vii 37.

* * A similar story is told of Achilles. His mother Thetis was taking similar precautions to render him immortal, when his father Peleus (2 syl) interfered—Apollonius Rhodius, Argonautic Exp, iv 866.

Demos'thenes of the Pulpit. Dr Thomas Rennell, dean of Westminster, was so called by William Pitt (1753-1810).

Dendin (Peter), an old man, who had settled more disputes than all the magistrates of Poitiers, though he was no judge. His plan was to wait till the litigants were thoroughly sick of their contention, and longed to end their disputes, then would he interpose, and his judgment could not fail to be acceptable.

Tenot Dendin, son of the above, but, unlike his father, he always tried to crush quarrels in the bud, consequently, he never succeeded in settling a single dispute submitted to his judgment—Rabelais, Pantagruel, iii 41 (1547).

(Racine has introduced the same name in his comedy called Les Plaideurs (1669), and Lafontaine in his Fables, 1668.)

Dennet (Father), an old peasant at the lists of St George—Sir W Scott, Levantho (time, Richard I).

Dennis the hargman, one of the ringleaders of the "No Popery riots," the other two were Hugh servant of the May pole inn, and the half-witted Barnaby Rudge. Dennis was cheerful enough when he "turned off" others, but when he himself ascended the gibbet he showed a most grovelling and craven spirit—Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Dennis (John), "the best abused man in English literature." Swift lampooned him, Pope assailed him in the Essay on Criticism, and finally he was "damned to everlasting fame" in the Dunciad. He is called "Lo'illus" (1657-1733).

Dennison (Jenny), attendant on Miss Edith Beilenden. She marries Cuddie Headingg—Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II).

Dent de Lait (Une), a prejudice. After M Bernalde has been running down Dr Purgon as a humbug, Argan replies, "C'est que vous avez, mon frère, un dent de lait contre lui"—Molière, Le Malade Imaginaire, iii 3 (1673).

D'Eon de Beaumont (Le chevalier), a person notorious for the ambiguity of his sex, said to be the son of an advocate. His face was pretty, without beard, moustache, or whiskers. Louis XV sent him as a woman to Russia on a secret mission, and he presented himself to the empress as a woman (1766). In the Seven Years War he was appointed captain of dragons. In 1777 he assumed the dress of a woman again, which he maintained till death (1729-1810).

Derbend (The Iron Gates of), called the "Albanian Portæ," or the "Caspian's Gate." Iron gates, which closed the defile of Derbend. There is still debris of a great wall, which once ran from the Black Sea to the Caspian. It is said that Alexander founded Derbend on the west coast of the Caspian, and that Khosru the Great fortified it. Haroun-al-Raschid often resided there. Its ancient name was Albana, and hence the province Seljuvan was called Albania.

* * The gates called Albania Pylæ were not the "Caspian's Gate," but "Trajan's Gate" or "Kopula Derbend."

Derby (Earl of), third son of the earl of Lancaster, and near kinsman of Edward III. His name was Henry Plantagenet, and he died 1362. Henry Plantagenet, earl of Derby, was sent to protect Guienne, and was noted for his humanity no less than for his bravery. He defeated the comte de Fflle at Bergerac, reduced Périgord, took the castle of Auberoche, in Gascony, overthrew 10,000 French with only 1000, taking prisoners nine earls and nearly all the barons, knights, and squires (1345). Next year he took the fortresses of Monsegur, Monseign, Villefranche, Miramont, Tennins, Damassen Argulon, and Reole

Derrick (Tom), quarter-master of the pirate's vessel—Sir W. Scott, The Pirate (time, William III.)

Derby-Down Triangle (The), lord Castlereagh, afterwards marquis of Londonderry, so called by William Hone. The first word is a pun on the title, the second refers to his lordship's oratory, a triangle being the most feeble, monotonous, and unmusical of all musical instruments. Tom Moore compares the oratory of lord Castlereagh to "water spouting from a pump"

Desdemona, daughter of Brabantio a Venetian senator, in love with Othello the Moor (general of the Venetian army). The Moor loves her intensely, and marries her, but Iago, by artful villainy, induces him to believe that she loves Cassio too well. After a violent conflict between love and jealousy, Othello smothers her with a bolster, and then stabs himself—Shakespeare, Othello (1611)

The soft simplicity of Desdemona, confident of merit and conscious of innocence, her ardent perseverance in her suit and her slowness to suspect that she can be suspected are proofs of Shakespeare's skill in human nature.—Dr. Johnson.

Desert Fairy (The). This fairy was guarded by two lions, which could be pacified only by a cake made of millet, sugar candy, and crocodiles' eggs. The Desert Fairy said to Alfar, "I swear by my coil you shall marry the yellow Dwarf, or I will burn my crutch"—Comtesse D'Annoy, Fairy Tales ("The Yellow Dwarf," 1682)

Deserted Daughter (The), a comedy by Holcroft. Joanna was the daughter of Mordent, but her mother died, and Mordent married lady Anne. In order to do so he ignored his daughter and had her brought up by strangers, intending to apprentice her to some trade. Then, a money-lender, acting on the advice of Mordent, lodges the girl with Mrs. Enfield, a crump, where Lennox is introduced to her, and obtains Mordent's consent to run away with her. In the interim Cheveril sees her, falls in love with her, and determines to marry her. Mordent repents, takes the girl home, acknowledges her to be his daughter, and she becomes the wife of the gallant young Cheveril (1784).

* * * This comedy has been recast, and called The Steward

Deserted Village (The). The poet has his eye chiefly on Lissos, its landscapes and characters. Here his father was pastor. He calls the village Auburn, but tells us it was the seat of his youth, every spot of which was dear and familiar to him. He describes the pastor, the schoolmaster, the ale-house, then tells us that luxury has killed all the simple pleasures of village life, but asks the friends of truth to judge how wide the limits "between a splendid and a happy land." Now the man of wealth and pride Desertei (The), a musical drama by Dibdin (1770). Henry, a soldier, is engaged to Louisa, but during his absence some rumours of gallantry to his disad-vantage reach the village, and to test his love, Louisa in pretence goes with Simkin as if to be married. Henry sees the procession, is told it is Louisa's wedding day, and in a fit of desperation gives himself up as a deserter, and is condemned to death. Louisa goes to the king, explains the whole affair, and returns with his pardon as the muffled drums begin to beat.

Desmas The repentant thief is so called in The Story of Joseph of Arimathea, but Dismas in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus. Longfellow, in The Golden Legend, calls him Dismachus. The impenitent thief is called Gestas, but Longfellow calls him Titus.

Desmonds of Kilmallock (Limerick) The legend is that the last powerful head of this family, who perished in the reign of queen Elizabeth, still keeps his state under the waters of Lough Gur, that every seventh year he re-appears fully armed, rides round the lake early in the morning, and will ultimately return in the flesh to claim his own again. (See BANNROSS.)—Sir W. Scott, Fairfaxes of Nigel

Despair (Giant) lived in Doubting Castle. He took Christian and Hopeful captives for sleeping on his grounds, and locked them in a dark dungeon from Wednesday to Saturday, without "one bit of bread, or drop of drink, or ray of light." By the advice of his wife, Diffidence, the giant beat them soundly "with a crab-tree cudgel." On Saturday night Christian remembered he had a key in his bosom, called "Promise," which would open any lock in Doubting Castle. So he opened the dungeon door, and they both made their escape with speed.—John Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, 1 (1678)

Devil (The Printer's) Aldus Manutius, a printer in Venice to the holy Church and the doge, employed a negro boy to help him in his office. This little black boy was believed to be an imp of Satan, and went by the name of the "printer's devil." In order to protect him from persecution, and confute a foolish superstition, Manutius made a public exhibition of the boy, and announced that "any one who doubted him to be flesh and blood might come forward and pinch him."

Devil (Robert the), of Normandy, so called because his father was said to have been an incubus or wend in the disguise of a knight (1028-1035)

* * Robert François Damiens is also called Robert le Diable, for his attempt to assassinate Louis XV (1711-1757)

Devil (Son of the), Tz'eh'no, chief of the Gibelins, governor of Vicenza. He was so called for his infamous cruelties (1210-1250).

Devil Dick, Richard Porson, the critic (1759-1808).

Devil on Two Sticks (The), that is Le Diable Boiteux, by Lesage (1707). The plot of this humorous satirical tale is borrowed from the Spanish, El Diabolo Cojuelo, by Guevara (1637). Asmodeus (le diable boiteux) perches on Cleofas on the steeple of St. Salvador, and stretching out his hand the roofs of all the houses open, and expose to him what is being done privately in every dwelling.

Devil on Two Sticks (The), a farce by S. Foote, a satire on the medical profession.

Devil to Pay (The), a farce by C. Coffey. Sir John Loverule has a terragant wife, and Zackel Jobson a patient grissel. Two spirits named Nadir and Ab'ishog transform these two wives for a time, so that the terragant is given to Jobson, and the patient wife to sir John. When my lady tries her tricks on Jobson, he takes his strap to her and soon reduces her to obedience. After she is well reformed, the two are restored to their original husbands, and the shrew becomes an obedient, modest wife (died 1740).

The Devil to Pay was long a favourite chiefly for the character of "Nell" [the cobbler's wife], which made the fortunes of several actresses.—Chambers' English Literature II. 151.

Devil's Age (The). A wealthy man once promised to give a poor gentleman and his wife a large sum of money if at a given time they could tell him the devil's age. When the time came the gentleman, at his wife's suggestion, plunged first into a barrel of honey and then into a barrel of feathers, and walked on all fours. Presently, up came his Sat'nic majesty, and said, "X and x years have I lived," naming the exact number, "yet never saw I an animal like this." The gentleman had heard enough, and was able to answer the question without difficulty.—Rev W. Webster, Basque Legends, 58 (1877).

Devil's Arrows, three remarkable "druidical" stones near Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire. Probably these stones simply mark the boundary of some property or jurisdiction.

Devil's Bridge (The), mentioned by Longfellow, in the Golden Legend, is the bridge over the falls of the Reuss, in the canton of the Uri, in Switzerland.

Devil's Chalice (The). A wealthy man gave a poor farmer a large sum of money on this condition: at the end of a twelvemonth he was either to say "of what the devil made his chalice," or else give his head to the devil. The poor farmer, as the time came round, hid himself in the cross-roads, and presently the witches assembled from all sides. Said one witch to another, "You know that Farmer So-and-so has sold his head to the devil, for he will never know of what the devil makes his chalice." In fact, I don't know myself." "Don't you?" said the other, "why, of the parings of finger-nails trimmed on Sundays." The farmer was overjoyed, and when the time came round was quite ready with his answer.—Rev W. Webster, Basque Legends, 71 (1877).

Devil's Current (The). Part of the current of the Bosphorus is so called from its great rapidity.

Devil's Den, a cromlech in Preschute, near Marlborough.

Devil's Dyke (The), otherwise called Grim's Dyke. This dyke ran from Newmarket into Lincolnshire, and was designed to separate Mercia from the East Angles. Part of the southern boundary of Mercia (from Hampshire to the mouth of the Severn) was called "Woden's Dyke," the present Wan's Dyke.

Men's low estimate
That by Wberefo

Wynston 107yoblon xxi. (162.).

Devil's Dyke, Brighton (The). One day, as St. Cuthman was walking over the South Downs, and thinking to himself how completely he had rescued the whole country from paganism, he was accosted by his sable majesty in person. "Ha, ha!" said the prince of darkness, "so you think by these churches and convents to put me and mine to your ban, do you? Poor fool! why, this very night will I swamp the whole land with the sea." "Forewarned is forearmed," thought St. Cuthman, and hies him to sister Cecilia, superior of a convent which then stood on the spot of the present Dyke House. "Sister," said the saint, "I love you well. This night, for the grace of God, keep lights burning at the convent windows from midnight to day—brenk, and let in a ves he sud by the holy sisterhood " At sundown came the devil with pickaxe and spade, mattock and shovel, and set to work in right good earnest to dig a dyke which should let the waters of the sea into the downs "Fire and brimstone!"—he exclaimed, as a sound of voices rose and fell in sacred song—"Fire and brimstone! What's the matter with me?" Shoulders, feet, wrists, loins, all seemed paralyzed Down went mattock and spade, pickaxe and shovel, and just at that moment the lights at the convent windows burst forth, and the cock, mistaking the blaze for daybreak, began to crow most lustily Off flew the devil, and never again returned to complete his work The small digging he effected still remains in witness of the truth of this legend of the "Devil's Dyke"

Devil's Flying-Pan (The), a Cornish mine worked by the ancient Romans According to a very primitive notion, precious stones are produced from condensed dew hardened by the sun This mine was the flying-pan where dew was thus converted and hardened

Devil's Parliament (The), the parliament assembled by Henry VI at Coventry, in 1459 So called because it passed attenders on the duke of York and his chief supporters

Devil's Throat (The) Cromer Bay is so called, because it is so dangerous to navigation

Devil's Wall (The), the wall separating England from Scotland So called from its great durability

Devonshire, according to historic fable, is a corruption of "Debon's-shire" This Debon was one of the companions of Brute, the descendant of Aeneas He chased the giant Conlin till he came to a pit eight leagues across Trying to leap this chasm, the giant fell backwards and lost his life that ample pit, yet far renowned

For the great leap which Debon did compel Couth to make, being eight leagues of ground
Into the which retourning back he fell

De'vorgoil (Fady Jane), a friend of the Hazelwood family—Sir W Scott, Guy Rannering (time, George II)

Dewlap (Diel), an anecdote teller, whose success depended more upon his physiognomy than his wit His chin and his punch were his most telling points

I found that the merit of his wit was founded upon the shaking of a fat punch and the tossing up of a pair of rosy jowls —Ireland Steele

Dhu (Evan), of Lochiel, a Highland chief, in the army of Montrose

Mitch-Connel Dhu, or M'Idun, a Highland chief, in the army of Montrose—Sir W Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I)

Dhu'dul, the famous horse of Ali, son-in-law of Mahomet

Dhu'l Karnein ("the two-horned"), a true believer according to the Mohammedan notion, who built the wall to prevent the incursions of Gog and Magog—Al koran, xiiii

Commentators say the wall was built in this manner. The workmen dug till they found water and having laid the foundation of stone and melted brass, they built the superstructure of lattice pieces of iron between which they packed wood and coal till the whole equalled the height of the mountains [of Ararat]. Then within fire to the combustion, and by the use of bellows, they made the iron red hot and poured molten brass over to fill up the interstices.—Al Mehdawi.

Dhu'nun, the surname of Jonah, so called because he was swallowed by a fish

Remember Dhu'nun when he departed in wrath and the thought that we could not exercise our power over him.—Al koran, xxi.

Diafoirus (Thomas), son of Dr Diafoirus He is a young medical milkop, to whom Argin has pronounced his daughter Angelique in marriage Diafoirus gives his compliments in cut-and-dried speeches, and on one occasion, being interrupted in his remarks, says, "Madame, vous m'avez interrompu dans le milieu de ma periode, et cela m'a trouble la memoire" His father says, "Thomms, recevez cela pour une autre fois" Angelique loves Cleante (2 syl), and Thomms Diafoirus goes to the wall

Il n'a jamais eu l'imagination bien vive ni ce feu d'esprit qu'on remarque dans quelques uns. Lorsqu'il était petit il n'a jamais été ce qu'on appelle méfiant et éveillé on le voyait toujours doux paisible et inaltérable ne disant jamais mot et ne jouant jamais à tous ces petits jeux que l'on nomme enfantine.—Moliere Le Malade Imaginaire II. 6 (1673)

One twelve moons more she'll wear Diana's livery, Till both she waxed.

Shakespeare Pericles Prince of Tyre act II, sc. 5 (1612)

Diana, wife of Gilberto of Truili, but amorously loved by Ansaldo. In order to rid herself of his importunities, she vowed never to yield to him until he could "make her garden at midwinter as gay with flowers as it was in summer" (meaning actor). Ansaldo, by the aid of a magician, accomplished the appointed task, but when the lady told him her husband insisted on her keeping her promise, Ansaldo, not to be outdone in generosity, declined to take advantage of his claim, and from that day forth was the firm and honorable friend of Gilberto — Boccaccio, Decameron, 5

The Franklin's Tale of Chaucer is substantially the same story (See DOUGLAS)

Diarmid, noted for his "beauty spot," which he covered up with his cap, for if any woman chanced to see it, she would instantly fall in love with him — Campbell, Tales of the West Highlands ("Diarmid and Grannie")

Diav'olo (Ira), Michele Porza, insurgent of Calabria (1760-1806) — Auber, Ira Diavolo (libretto by Seribe, 1836)

Dibble (Darn), gardener at Monk-barns — Sir W. Scott, Antiquary (time, George III)

Dibu'tades (1 syl), a potter of Sicion, whose daughter traced on the wall her lover's shadow, cast there by the light of a lamp. This, it is said, is the origin of portrait painting. The father applied the same process to his pottery, and this, it is said, is the origin of sculpture in relief

Will the arts ever have a lovelier origin than that fair daughter of Diomedes tracing the beloved shadow on the wall?—Soldat Ariadne L 6

Dicea'a, daughter of Jove, the "rescuing angel" of classic mythology

Forth stepped the just Dicea full of rage
Phileas Fletcher The Purple Island vi (1633)

Diceon the Bedlamite, a half-mad mendicant, both knife and staff. A specimen of the metre will be seen by part of Diceon's speech

Many a mile have I walked divers and sundry wakes
And many a good man's house have I bin nt in my dais

Dick (Mr), an amiable, half-witted man, devoted to David's "aunt," Miss Betsey Trotwood, who thinks him a prodigious genius. Mr Dick is especially mad on the subject of Charles I—C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

Dick Amlet, the son of Mrs Amlet, a rich, vulgar tradeswoman. Dick assumes the airs of a fine gentleman, and calls himself colonel Shapel, in which character he gets introduced to Corinna, the daughter of Gripe, a rich servicer. Just as he is about to clope, his mother makes her appearance, and the deceit is laid bare, but Mrs Amlet promises to give her son £10,000, and so the wedding is adjusted. Dick is a regular scamp, and wholly without principle, but being a dashing young blade, with a handsome person, he is admired by the ladies—Sir John Vanbrugh, The Confidante (1695)

John Palmer was the Dick Amlet, and John Banister the rogish servant. Brass.—James Smith (1730)

And what excelth but what dieth young?
Drummond (1585-1549)

Die'go, the sexton to Lopez the "Spanish curate"—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Spanish Curate (1622)

Die'go (Don), a man of 60, who saw a country maiden named Leonora, whom he liked, and intended to marry if her temper was as amiable as her face was pretty. He obtained leave of her parents to bring her home and place her under a duenna for three months, and then either return her to them spotless, or to make her his wife. At the expiration of the time, he went to settle the marriage contract, and, to make all things sure, locked up the house, giving the keys to Ursula, but to the outer door he attached a huge padlock, and put the key in his pocket. Leander, being in love with Leonora, laughed at locksmiths and duennas, and Diego (2 syl) found them about to elope. Being a wise man, he not only consented to their union, but gave Leonora a handsome marriage portion — I Bickerstaff, The Padlock.

Dietrich (2 syl) So Theodor the Great is called by the German minnesingers. In the terrible broil stirred up by queen Kriemhild in the banquet hall of Etzel, Dietrich interfered, and succeeded in capturing Hagan and the Burgundian king Gunther. These he handed over to the queen, praying her to set them free, but she cut off both their heads with her own hands — The Nibelungen Lied (thirteenth century)

Dietrich (John), a labourer's son of Pomerania. He spent twelve years under ground, where he met Elizabeth Krabbin, daughter of the minister of his own village, Ramin. One day, walking together, they heard a cock crow, and an irresistible desire came over both of them to visit the upper earth. John so frightened the elves by a toad, that they yielded to his wish, and gave him hoards of wealth, with part of which he bought half the island of Rügen. He married Elizabeth, and became the founder of a very powerful family — Behtley, Fairy Mythology. (See TANNIUSLI.)

Dieu et Mon Droit, the parole of Richard I at the battle of Gisors (1198)

Diggery, one of the house-servants at Strawberry Hall. Being stage-struck, he inoculates his fellow-servants (Cimon and Wat) with the same taste. In the same house is an heiress named Kitty Sprightly (a ward of sir Gilbert Pumpkin), also stage-struck. Diggery's favourite character was "Alexander the Great," the son of "Almon." One day, playing Roméo and Juliet, he turned the oven into the balcony, but, being rung for, the girl acting "Innet" was nearly roasted alive. (See DICKORY) — J Jackson, All the World's a Stage

Digges (Miss Maria), a friend of lady Penfeather, a visitor at the Spr — Sir W Scott, St Roman's Will (time, George III)

Diggon [Davie], a shepherd in the Shepherd's Calendar, by Spenser. He tells Hobbinol that he drove his sheep into foreign lands, hoping to find better pasture, but he was amazed at the luxury and profligacy of the shepherds whom he saw there, and the wretched condition of the flocks. He refers to the Roman Catholic clergy, and their abandoned mode of life. Diggon also tells Hobbinol a long story about Rossin (the bishop of Rochester) and his watchful dog Lauder catching a wolf in sheep's clothing in the fold — Icl. ix (September, 1572 or 1578).

Diggory, a barn labourer, employed on state occasions for butler and footman by Mr and Mrs Hardcastle. He is both awkward and familiar, laughs at his master's jokes and talks to his master's guests while serving. (See DIGGORY) — Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer (1773)

Diggon (Father), one of the monks of St Botolph's Priory — Sir W. Scott, Lianhoe (time, Richard I)

Dill or Ane'thum. The seeds are warm, strong-smelling, and aromatic

The wonder working dill he gets

Drayton Polyolbon xiii (1613)

Dimanche (Mons), a dun. Monday. Dimanche, a tradesman, applies to don Juan for money. Don Juan treats him with all imaginable courtesy, but every time he attempts to revert to business interrupts him with some such question as, Comment se porte madame Dimanche?

or Et votre petite fille Claudine, comment se porte-t-elle? or Le petit Colin, fait-il toujours bien du bruit avec son tambour? or Et votre petit chien Brusquet, gronde-t-il toujours aussi fort? and, after a time, he says he is very sorry, but he must say good-bye for the present, and he leaves Mons without his once stating the object of his call (See SIUULETOR)—Molière, Don Juan, etc (1665)

Din (The), the practical part of Islam, containing the ritual and moral laws

Dinah [Friendly], daughter of sir Thomas Friendly. She loves Edward Blushington, "the bushful man," and becomes engaged to him—W T Moncreiff, The Bushful Man

Dinah, daughter of Sandie Lawson, landlord of the Spa hotel—Sir W Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III)

Dinah (Aunt) leaves Mr Walter Shandy £1000. This sum of money, in Walter's eye, will suffice to carry out all the wild schemes and extravagant fancies that enter into his head—Sterne, Tristram Shandy (1759)

Dinant, a gentleman who once loved and still pretends to love Lamira, the wife of Champignel—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Little French Lawyer (1647)

Dinazade (4 syl), sister of Scheherazade sultana of Persia. Dinarzadé was instructed by her sister to wake her every morning an hour before daybreak, and say, "Sister, relate to me one of those delightful stories you know," or "Finish before daybreak the story you began yesterday." The sultan got interested in these tales, and reviled the cruel determination he had made of strangling at daybreak the wife he had married the preceding night (See SCHERAZADE)

Dinas Emrys or "Fort of Ambrose" (i.e. Merlin), on the Brith, a part of Snowdon. When Vortigern built this fort, whatever was constructed during the day was swallowed up in the earth during the night. Merlin (then called Ambrose or Imbres-Guletic) discovered the cause to be "two serpents at the bottom of a pool below the foundation of the works." These serpents were incessantly struggling with each other, one was white, and the other red. The white serpent at first prevailed, but ultimately the red one chased the other out of the pool. The red serpent, he said, meant the Britons, and the white one the Saxons. At first the Saxons (or white serpent) prevailed, but in the end "our people" (the red serpent) "shall chase the Saxon race beyond the sea"—Nennius, History of the Britons (842)

And from the top of Brith, so high and wondrous steep Where Dinus Emrys stood, showed where the serpents fought
The white that tore the red for whence the prophet taught
The Britons sad decay

Drayton, Polyolbion x. (1612)

Dine with Democritos (To), to be choused out of your dinner.

A "Barmecide feast" is no feast at all. The allusion is to Barmecide, who invited Scheerabad to dine with him, and set before him only empty plates and dishes, pretending that the "wands" were most excellent. (See BARMECIDE)

Dine with duke Humphrey (To), to have no dinner to go to. The duke referred to was the son of Henry IV, murdered at St Edmundsbury, and buried at St Alban's. It was generally thought that he was buried in the nave of St Paul's Cathedral, but the monument supposed to be erected to the duke was in reality that of John Beauchamp Loungers, who were asked if they were not going home to dinner, and those who tarried in St Paul's after the general crowd had left, were supposed to be so busy looking for the duke's monument that they disregarded the dinner hour.

Dine with Mahomet (To), to die. Similar to the classic phrase, "To sup with Pluto."

Dine (or Sup) with sir Thomas Gresham, to have no dinner or supper to go to. At one time the Royal Exchange was the common lounging-place of idlers and vagabonds.

The little coin thy purseless pockets line
Yet with great company thou art taken up
For often with duke Humphrey thou dost dine.
And often with sir Thomas Gresham sup
Hayman Epigram on a Loaf (163)

Dine with the Cross-Logged Knights (To), to have no dinner to go to. Lawyers at one time made appointments with their clients at the Round Church, and here a host of dinnerless vagabonds loitered about all day, in the hope of picking up a few pence for little services.

Diner-Out of the First Water, the Rev. Sidney Smith, so called by the Quarterly Review (1769-1815)

Dinias and Dercyllis (The Wanderings, Adventures, and Loves of), an old Greek novel, the basis of the romance of Antonius Diogenes in twenty-four books and entitled Incredible Things beyond Thule [In Hyperborean Apista], a store-house from which subsequent writers have borrowed largely. The work is not extant, but Photius gives an outline of its contents

Dinnmont (Dandy, i.e. Andrew), an eccentric and humorous store farmer at Charlie's Hope. He is called "The lightning Dinnmont of Liddesdale"

Aidu Dinnmont, wife of Dandy Dinnmont — Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

 This novel has been dramatized by Daniel Terry

Dinner Bell Burke was so called from his custom of speaking so long as to interfere with the dinner of the members (1729-1797)

Dinnerless (The) are said to sit at a "Barmecide feast," to "dine with duke Humphrey," to "dine with sir Thomas Gresham," to "dine with Democritus." Their hosts are said to be the cross-legged knights

Diocletian, the king and father of Erastus, who was plined under the charge of the "seven wise masters" (Italian version)

In the French version, the father is called "Dolop'athos"

Diogenes (4 syl), the negro slave of the cynic philosopher Michael Agelastos (1 syl) — Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Diomede (3 syl) fed his horses on human flesh, and he was himself eaten by his horse, being thrown to it by Hercules

Dion (Lord), father of Iuphrasia. Euphrasia is in love with Philaster, heir to the crown of Messina. Disguised as a page, Iuphrasia assumes the name of Bellario and enters the service of Philaster — Beaumont and Fletcher, Philaster or Love Laid a-bleeding (1638)

(There is considerable resemblance between "Euphrasia" and "Viola" in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, 1614.)

Dionæ'an Cæsar, Julius Cæsar, who claimed descent from Venus, called Dionæ from her mother. Æneus was son of Iulus and Anclæus Ecce Dionæi prociat Cæsaris astrum.

Virgil, Eclogues ix. 47

Dionæ (3 syl), mother of Aphrodite (Venus), Zeus or Jove being the father. Venus herself is sometimes called Dionæ

Oh bear thy treasures to the green recess,
Where young Dionæ strays with sweetest bliss
Frithe her birth to lend her angel form
For beauty's honoured bliss.

Æneid's Pæan of Imagination, I. (1744)

Dionysia, wife of Cleon governor of Iarsus. Pericles prince of Tyre commits to her charge his infant daughter Marina, supposed to be motherless. When 14 years old, Dionysia, out of jealousy, employs a man to murder her foster-child, and the people of Iarsus, hearing thereof, set fire to her house, and both Dionysia and Cleon are burnt to death in the flames — Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1606)

Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, de-throned Lander, and imprisoned him in a dungeon deep in a huge rock, intending to starve him to death. But Euphrasia, having gained access to him, fed him from her own breast. Timoleon invaded Syracuse, and Dionysius, seeking safety in a tomb, saw there Lander the deposed king, and was about to kill him, when Euphrasia rushed forward, struck the tyrant to the heart, and he fell dead at her feet — A. Murphy, The Grecian Daughter (1772)

 In this tragedy there are several gross historical errors. In act i the author tells us it was Dionysius the Elder who was de-throned, and went in exile to Corinth, but the elder Dionysius died in Syracuse, at the age of 63, and it was the younger Dionysius who was de-throned by Timoleon, and went to

Corinth In act v he makes Lupprius kill the tyrant in Syracuse, whereas he was allowed to leave Sicily, and retired to Corinth, where he spent his time in riotous living, etc

Dionysius [THE ELDER] was appointed sole general of the Syracusan army, and then king by the voice of the senate. Damon "the Pythagorean" opposed the appointment, and even tried to slay "the tyrant," but was arrested and condemned to death. Distaffina, the troth-plight wife of general Bombasts, but Artaxaminous, king of Utopia, promised her "half a crown" if she would forsake the general for himself—a temptation too great to be resisted. When the general found himself jilted, he retired from the world, hung up his boots on the branch of a tree, and direct any one to remove them. The king cut the boots down, and the general cut the king down. Furbos, coming up at this crisis, laid the general prostrate. At the close of the burlesque all the dead men jump up and join the dance, promising "to die again to-morrow," if the audience desires it.—W B Rhodes, Bombastic Furbos (1790)

Distressed Mother (The), a tragedy by Ambrose Philips (1712). The "distressed mother" is Andromachê, the widow of Hector. At the fall of Troy she and her son Astyanax fell to the lot of Pyrrhus king of Epirus. Pyrrhus fell in love with her and wished to marry her, but she refused him. At length an embassy from Greece, headed by Orestes, son of Agamemnon, was sent to Epirus to demand the death of Astyanax, lest in manhood he might seek to avenge his father's death. Pyrrhus told Andromachê he would protect her son, and defy all Greece, if she would consent to marry him, and she yielded. While the marriage rites were going on, the Greek ambassadors fell on Pyrrhus and murdered him. As he fell he placed the crown on the head of Andromachê, who thus became queen of Epirus, and the Greeks hastened to their ships in flight. Divina Commedia, the first poem of note ever written in the Italian language. It is an epic by Dante Alighieri, and is divided into three parts: Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise. Dante called it a comedy, because the ending is happy; and his countrymen added the word divine from admiration of the poem. The poet depicts a vision, in which he is conducted, first by Virgil (human reason) through hell and purgatory, and then by Beatrice (revelation) and finally by St Bernard through the seven heavens, where he beholds the Triune God

"Hell" is represented as a funnel-shaped hollow, formed of gradually contracting circles, the lowest and smallest of which is the earth's centre. (See ILLUSTR., 1300)

"Purgatory" is a mountain rising solitarily from the ocean on that side of the earth which is opposite to us. It is divided into terraces, and its top is the terrestrial paradise. (See PURGATORY, 1308)

From this "top" the poet ascends through the seven planetary heavens, the fixed stars, and the "primum mobile,"

to the empyre'an or seat of God (See PARADISE, 1811)

Doctor's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, is the Roman story of Virginius given by Livy. This story is told in French in the Roman de la Rose, in 74, and by Gower in his Confessio Amantis, vii. It has furnished the subject of a host of tragedies, for example, in French, Mairet (1628), Leclerc (1645), Campestron (1683), Chabanon (1769), Laharpe (1786), Leblanc de Guillet (1786), Gurmud (1827), Latour St. Ybars (1845). In Italian, Alfieri (1784), in German, Lessing (1775), and in English, Knowles (1829).

Dodo'na (in Epiros), famous for the most ancient oracle in Greece. The responses were made by an old woman called a pigeon, because the Greek word pelæ means either "old women" or "pigeons." According to fable, Zeus gave his daughter Thêbê two black pigeons endowed with the gift of human speech: one flew into Libya, and gave the responses in the temple of Ammon, the other into Epiros, where it gave the responses in Dodona.

We are told that the priestess of Dodona derived her answers from the cooing of the sacred doves, the rustling of the sacred trees, the bubbling of the sacred fountain, and the tinkling of bells or pieces of metal suspended among the branches of the trees.

Dods (Meg), landlady of the Clachan or Mowbery Arms inn at St. Ronan's Old Town. The inn was once the manse, and Meg Dods reigned there despotically, but her wines were good and her cuisine excellent. This is one of the best low comic characters in the whole range of fiction.

She had hair of a brindled colour between black and grey, which was apt to escape in elf locks from under her natch when she was thrown into violent agitation; long skinny hands terminated by stout talons; grey eyes thin lips; a robust person; a broad though fat chest; capital wind; and a voice that could match a choir of fish-women. —Sir W. Scott St. Ronan's Well, l. (time George III.).

Dodson, a young farmer, called upon by Death on his wedding day. Death told him he must quit his Susan, and go with him "With you!" the hapless husband cried, "Young as I am, and unprepared?" Death then told him he would not disturb him yet, but would call again after giving him three warnings. When he was 80 years of age, Death called again "So soon returned?" old Dodson cried "You know you promised me three warnings." Death then told him that as he was "lame and deaf and blind," he had received his three warnings. —Mrs. Thrale [Piozzi], The Three Warnings.

Dodson and Fogg (Messrs.), two unprincipled lawyers, who undertake on their own speculation to bring an action against Mr. Pickwick for "breach of promise," and file accordingly the famous suit of "Bardell v. Pickwick." —C. Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Llewellyn's Dog was named "Gelert," it was a greyhound (See GELERT).

Lord Lurgan's Dog was named "Master M'Grath," from an orphan boy who reared it. This dog won three Waterloo cups, and was presented at court by the express desire of Queen Victoria, the very year it died. It was a sporting greyhound (born 1866, died Christmas Day, 1871).

Maria's Dog, "Silvio." —Sterne, Sentimental Journey.

Dog of Montargis. This was a dog named "Dragon," belonging to Aubri de Montdidier, a captain in the French army Aubri was murdered in the forest of Bondy by his friend, lieutenant Macaire, in the same regiment. After its master's death, the dog showed such a strange aversion to Macaire, that suspicion was aroused against him. Some say he was pitted against the dog, and confessed the crime. Others say a sash was found on him, and the sword-knot was recognized by Ursula as her own work and gift to Aubri. This Macaire then confessed the crime, and his accomplice, lieutenant Landry, trying to escape, was seized by the dog and bitten to death. This story was dramatized in French by Pixérécourt (1814), and rendered into English.

Dogget's Coat and Badge, the great prize in the Thames rowing-match, given on the 1st of August every year. So called from Thomas Dogget, an actor of Drury Lane, who signalized the accession of George I to the throne by giving annually a waterman's coat and badge to the winner of the race. The Fishmongers' Company add a guinea to the prize.

Doiley (Abraham), a citizen and retired slop-seller. He was a charity boy, wholly without education, but made £80,000 in trade, and is determined to have "a learned scholar for his son-in-law."

He speaks of geometry [geowetry], geometry, Al Ma'ter pany, forty, and artificary doctors, talks of Scratch [Gracchi], Horsi [Horatii], a study of Forces, and so on. Being resolved to judge between the rival scholarship of an Oxford pedant and a captain in the army, he gets both to speak Greek before him. Gradus, the scholar, quotes two lines of Greek, in which the word pantry occurs four times. "Pantry" cries the old sloop-seller, "you can't impose upon me. I know pantry is not Greek." The captain tries English furian, and when Gradus maintains that the words are English. "Out upon you for a jackanapes" cries the old man, "as if I didn't know my own mother tongue!" and gives his verdict in favour of the captain.

Flizack Dour, daughter of the old sloop-seller, in love with captain Granger. She and her cousin Charlotte induce the Oxford scholar to dress like a beau to please the ladies. Dolly Trull Captain Muench's says she was "so taken up with stealing hearts she left herself no time to steal anything else"—Gay, The Beggar's Opera, u 1 (1727)

Dolly Varden, daughter of Gabriel Varden, locksmith. She was loved to distraction by Joe Willet, Hugh of the Marpole inn and Simon Tappertit. Dolly dressed in the Watteau style, and was lovely pretty, and bewitching—C Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841)

Dolman, a light-blue loose-fitting jacket braided across the front with black silk frogs and embroidered from the cuffs almost to the shoulders with gold lace of three rows interwoven. It is used as the summer jacket of the Algerian native troops. The winter jacket is called a "pelisse."

Dolon, "a man of subtle wit and wicked mind," father of Guizor (groom of Pollente the Saracen, lord of "Parlous Bridge"). Sir Aragal, with scant ceremony, knocks the life out of Guizor, for demanding of him "passage-penny" for crossing the bridge. Soon afterwards, Britomart and Talus re-appear in Dolon's castle for the night, and Dolon, mistaking Britomart for sir Aragal, sets upon her in the middle of the night, but is overmastered. He runs with his two surviving sons to the bridge, to prevent the passage of Britomart and Talus, but Britomart runs one of them through with her spear, and knocks the other into the river—Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 6 (1596)

Dolon and Ulysses. Dolon undertook to enter the Greek camp and bring word back to Hector an exact account of everything. Accordingly he put on a wolf's skin and prowled about the camp on all four. Ulysses saw through the disguise and said to Diomed "Yonder man is from the boat. We'll let him pass a few paces, and then pounce on him unexpectedly." They soon caught the fellow, and having "pumped" out of him all about the Trojan plans, and the arrival of Rhesus, Diomed smote him with his falchion on the mid-neck and slew him. This is the subject of bk x of the Iliad, and therefore this book is called "Dolonia" ("the deeds of Dolon") or "Dölophon'ia" ("Dolon's murder")

Full of cunning like Ulysses' whilst

Byron Don Juan, xii. 105 (1824)

Dolopa'tos, the Sicilian king, who placed his son Lucien under the charge of "seven wise masters." When grown to man's estate, Lucien's step-mother made improper advances to him, which he repulsed, and she accused him to the king of insulting her. By astrology the prince discovered that if he could tide over seven days his life would be saved, so the wise masters amused the king with seven tales, and the king relented. The prince himself then told a tale which embodied his own history, the eyes of the king were opened, and the queen was condemned to death—Sandabar's Parables (French version)

Dombey (Mr), a purse-proud, self-contained London merchant, living in Portland Place, Brynstone Square, with offices in the City. His god was wealth, and his one ambition was to have a son, that the firm might be known as "Dombey and Son." When Paul was born, his ambition was attained, his whole heart was in the boy, and the loss of the mother was but a small matter. The boy's death turned his heart to stone, and he treated his daughter Florence not only with utter indifference, but as an actual interloper. Mr Dombey married a second time, but his wife eloped with his manager, James Carver, and the proud spirit of the merchant was brought low.

Paul Dombey, son of Mr Dombey, a delicate, sensitive little boy, quite unequal to the great things expected of him. He was sent to Dr Blimber's school, but soon gave way under the strain of school discipline. In his short life he won the love of all who knew him, and his sister Florence was especially attached to him. His death is beautifully told. During his last days he was haunted by the sea, and was always wondering what the wild waves were saying.

Florence Dombey, Mr Dombey's daughter, a pretty, amiable, motherless child, who incurred her father's hatred because she lived and thrived while her younger brother Paul dwindled and died. Florence hungered to be loved, but her father had no love to bestow on her. She married Walter Gay, and when Mr Dombey was broken in spirit by the elopement of his second wife, his grandchildren were the solace of his old age—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846)

Dom-Daniel originally meant a public school for magic, established at Tunis, but what is generally understood by the word is that immense establishment, near Tunis, under the "roots of the ocean," established by Hal-il-Man'graby, and completed by his son. There were four entrances to it, each of which had a staircase of 4000 steps, and magicians, gnomes, and sorcerers of every sort were expected to do homage there at least once a year to Zatanai [Satan]. Dom-Daniel was utterly destroyed by prince Habad-il-Rouman, son of the caliph of Syria—Continuation of the Arabian Nights ("History of Maugraby")

Southey has made the destruction of Dom-Daniel the subject of his Thalaba—in fact, Thalaba takes the office of Habad-il-Rouman, but the general incidents of the two tales have no other resemblance to each other.

Domestic Poultry, in Dryden's Hind and Panther, mean the Roman Catholic clergy, so called from an establishment of priests in the private chapel of Whitehall. The nuns are termed "sister partlet with the hooded head" (1687)

Dominick, the "Spanish fryar," a kind of ecclesiastical Falstaff. A most immoral, licentious dominican, who for money would prostitute even the Church and Holy Scriptures. Dominick helped Lorenzo in his amour with Elvira the wife of Gomez.

Dom'ine Stekan (corruption of Dominus tecum, "tho Lord be with thee") A witch, being asked how she contrived to kill all the children of a certain family in infancy, replied, "Easily enough. When the infant sneezes, nobody says 'Domine stekan,' and then I become mistress of the child"—Rev W Webster, Basque Legends, 73 (1877)

Dominie Sampson, his Christian name is Abel. He is the tutor at Ellangowan House, very poor, very modest, and crammed with Latin quotations. His constant exclamation is "Prodigious!"

Domine Sampson is a poor modest, humble scholar who had won his way through the classics, but fallen to the leeward in the voyage of life.—Sir W. Scott, Guy Rannering (time, George II.)

Domique (3 syl), the gossiping old footman of the Franks, who fancies himself quite fit to keep a secret. He is, however, a really faithful retainer of the family.—Th. Holcroft, The Deaf and Dumb (1785)

Domitian a Marksman. The emperor Domitian was so cunning a marksman, that if a boy at a good distance off held up his hand and stretched his fingers abroad, he could shoot through the spaces without touching the boy's hand or any one of his fingers. (See TILI, for many similar marksmen).—Peacham, Complete Gentleman (1627)

Domizia, a noble lady of Florence, greatly embittered against the republic for its base ingratitude to her two brothers, Porzio and Berto, whose death she hoped to revenge

I am a daughter of the Taversani
Sister of Porzio and Berto both
I knew that Florence, that could doubt their faith

Donald, an old domestic of MacAnlay, the Highland chief.—Sir W. Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.)

Donald of the Hammer, son of the laird of Invernahile of the West Highlands of Scotland. When Green Colin assassinated the laird and his household the infant Donald was saved by his foster-nurse, and afterwards brought up by her husband, a blacksmith. He became so strong that he could work for hours with two fore-hammers, one in each hand, and was therefore called Donul nan Ord. When he was 21 he marched with a few adherents against Green Colin, and slew him, by which means he recovered his paternal inheritance

Donation of Pepin. When Pepin conquered Atanlf (Adolphus), the ex-archate of Ravenna fell into his hands. Pepin gave the pope both the ex-archate and the republic of Rome, and this munificent gift is the world-famous "Donation of Pepin," on which rested the whole fabric of the temporal power of the popes (A.D. 755). Victor Emmanuel, king of Italy, dispossessed the pope of his temporal sovereignty, and added the papal states to the united kingdom of Italy, over which he reigned (1870)

Dondasch', an Oriental giant, contemporary with Seth, to whose service he was attached. He needed no weapons, because he could destroy anything by his muscular force

Don'eguld (3 syl), the wicked mother of Alla king of Northumberland. Hating Custance because she was a Christian, Doneguld set her adrift with her infant son. When Alla returned from Scotland, and discovered this act of cruelty, he put his mother to death, then going to Rome on a pilgrimage, met his wife and child, who had been brought there a little time previously.—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Man of Law's Tale," 1888)

Don'et, the first grammar put into the hands of scholars. It was that of Dona'tus the grammarian, who taught in Rome in the fourth century, and was the preceptor of St Jerome. When "Graunde Amour" was sent to study under Lady Gramer, she taught him, as he says

First my donet, and then my accedence
S. Hawes, The Pastime of Pleasure v (time Henry VIII.)

Don'ea, only child of the lord of Arklow (an elderly man). Young El'berhard loved her, and the Finnish maiden was betrothed to him. Walking one evening by the lake, Donica heard the sound of the death-spectre, and fell lifeless in the arms of her lover. Presently the dead maiden received a supernatural vitality, but her cheeks were wan, her lips livid, her eyes lustreless, and her lap-dog howled when it saw her. Oberhard still resolved to marry her, and to church they went, but when he took Donica's hand into his own it was cold and clammy, the demon fled from her, and the body dropped a corpse at the feet of the bridegroom.—R Southey, Donica (a Finnish ballad)

Donnerhu'gel (Rudolph), one of the Swiss deputies to Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy. He is cousin of the sons of Arnold Biederman the landamman of Unterwalden (alias count Arnold of Geierstein)

Donzel del Fe'bo (El), the knight of the sun, a Spanish romance in The Mirror of Knighthood. He was "most excellently fair," and a "great wanderer," hence he is alluded to as "that wandering knight so fair"

Doo'lin of Mayence (2 syl), the hero and title of an old French romance of chivalry. He was ancestor of Ogier the Dane. His sword was called Marveilleuse ("wonderful")

Doomsday Sedgwick, William Sedgwick, a fanatical "prophet" during the Commonwealth. He pretended that the time of doomsday had been revealed to him in a vision, and, going into the garden of sir Francis Russell, he denounced a party of gentlemen playing at bowls, and bade them prepare for the day of doom, which was at hand

Doorm, an earl who tried to make Enid his handmaid, and "smote her on the cheek" because she would not welcome him. Whereupon her husband, count Geraint, started up and slew the "russet-bearded earl".—Tennyson, Idylls of the King ("Enid")

Door-Opener (The), Cratæus, the Theban, so called because he used to go round Athens early of a morning, and rebuke the people for their late rising

Dora [Spenlow], a pretty, warm-hearted little doll of a woman, with no practical views of the duties of life or the value of money. She was the "child-wife" of David Copperfield, and loved to sit by him and hold his pens while he wrote. She died, and David then married Agnes Wickfield. Dora's great pet was a dog called "Jip," which died at the same time as its mistress.—C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

Dora'do (El), a land of exhaustless wealth, a golden illusion. Orellana, lieutenant of Pizarro, asserted that he had discovered a "gold country" between the Orinoco and the Amazon, in South America. Sir Walter Raleigh twice visited Guiana as the spot indicated, and published highly coloured accounts of its enormous wealth

Doral'ce (4 syl), a lady beloved by Rodomont, but who married Mandricardo.—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Doralis, the lady-love of Rodomont king of Sarza or Algiers. She eloped with Mandricardo king of Tartary.—Bojardo, Orlando Innamorato (1495), and Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Doras'tus and Faunia, the hero and heroine of a popular romance by Robert Greene, published in 1588, under the title of Pandosto and the Triumph of Time. On this "history" Shakespeare founded his Winter's Tale

Why sir William. It is a romance a novel a pleasant history by half than the loves of Dorastus and Faunia.—Is. Bickerstaff Love in a Village iii. 1

Dorax, the assumed name of don Alonzo of Alcaraz, when he deserted Sebastian king of Portugal, turned renegade, and joined the emperor of Barbary. The cause of his desertion was that Sebastian gave to Henri'quez the lady betrothed to Alonzo. Her name was Violante (4 syl). The quarrel between Sebastian and Dorax is a masterly copy of the quarrel and reconciliation between Brutus and Cassius in Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar

Like Dorax "in the play I submitted 'tho with a swelling heart."—Sir W. Scott.

This quotation is not exact. It occurs in the "quarrel" Sebastian says to Dorax, "Confess, proud spirit, that better he [Henriquez] deserved my love than thou" To this Dorax replies

I must grant,
Yes I must grant but with a swelling soul
Henriquez had your love with more desert
For you he fought and died I fought against you

Dorothe'a, of Andalus'a, daughter of Cleonardo (an opulent vassal of the duke Ricardo). She was married to don Fernando, the duke's younger son, who deserted her for Lucinda (the daughter of an opulent gentleman), engaged to Cardenio, her equal in rank and fortune. When the wedding day arrived, Lucinda fell into a swoon, a letter informed the bridegroom that she was already married to Cardenio, and next day she took refuge in a convent. Dorothea also left her home, dressed in boy's clothes, and concealed herself in the Sierra Morena or Brown Mountain. Now, it so happened that Dorothea, Cardenio, and don Quixote's party happened to be staying at the Crescent inn, and don Fernando, who had abducted Lucinda from the convent, halted at the same place. Here he found his wife Dorothea, and Lucinda her husband Cardenio. All these misfortunes thus came to an end, and the parties united with their respective spouses — Cervantes, Don Quixote, I iv (1605)

Douban, the physician, cured a Greek king of leprosy by some drug concealed in a racket handle. The king gave Douban such great rewards that the envy of his nobles was excited, and his vizier suggested that a man like Douban was very dangerous to be near the throne. The fears of the weak king being aroused, he ordered Douban to be put to death. When the physician saw there was no remedy, he gave the king a book, saying, "On the sixth leaf the king will find something affecting his life." The king, finding the leaves stiek, moistened his finger with his mouth, and by so doing poisoned himself. "Tyrant!" exclaimed Douban, "those who abuse their power merit death." — Arabian Nights ("The Greek King and the Physician")

Douban, physician of the emperor Alexius — Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Double Dealer (The) "The double dealer" is Maskwell, who pretends love to lady Touchwood and friendship to Mellefont (2 syl), in order to betray them both. The other characters of the comedy also deal doubly. Thus lady Froth pretends to love her husband, but coquets with Mr Brisk, and lady Phant pretends to be chaste as Diana, but has a liaison with Careless. On the other hand, Brisk pretends to entertain friendship for lord Froth, but makes love to his wife, and Ned Careless pretends to respect and honour lord Phant, but bamboozles him in a similar way — W. Congreve (1700)

Douglas and the Bloody Heart. The heart of Bruce was entrusted to Douglas to carry to Jerusalem Landing in Spain, he stopped to aid the Christians against the Moors, and in the heat of battle cast the "heart," enshrined in a golden coffer, into the very thickest of the foe, saying, "The heart or death!" On he dashed, fearless of danger, to regain the coffer, but perished in the attempt The family thenceforth adopted the "bloody heart" as their armorial device

Douglas Larder (The) When the "Good sir James" Douglas, in 1306, took his castle by a coup de main from the English, he caused all the barrels containing flour, meal, wheat, and malt to be knocked in pieces and their contents to be thrown on the floor, he then staved in all the hogsheds of wine and also upon this mass To this he flung the dead bodies slain and some dead horses The English called this disgusting mess "The Douglas Larder" He then set fire to the castle and took refuge in the hills, for he said "he loved far better to hear the lark sing than the mouse cheep"

 Wallace's Larder is a similar phrase It is the dungeon of Ardrossan, in Ayrshire, where Wallace had the dead bodies of the garrison thrown, surprised by him in the reign of Edward I

Douloureuse Garde (La), a castle in Berwick-upon-Tweed, won by sir

Launcelet du Lac, in one of the most terrible adventures related in romance. In memory of this event, the name of the castle was changed into La Joyeuse Garde or La Garde Joyeuse.

Dousterswivel (Herman), a German schemer, who obtains money under the promise of finding hidden wealth by a divining rod—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.)

The incident of looking for treasure in the church is copied from one which Lily mentions, who went with David Ramsey to search for hid treasure in Westminster Abbey—See Old and New London l. 129.

Dove (Dr.), the hero of Southey's novel called The Doctor (1834).

Dove (Sir Benjamin), of Cropley Castle, Cornwall. A little, peaking, pulling creature, desperately hen-pecked by a second wife, but madam overshoot the mark, and the knight was roused to assert and maintain the mastery.

That very clever actor Cherry (1769-1812) appeared in 'Sir Benjamin Dove' and showed himself a master of his profession—Bosden.

Lady Dove, twice married, first to Mr. Searcher, king's messenger, and next to Sir Benjamin Dove. She had a tendresse for Mr. Paterson. Lady Dove was a terrible termagant, and when scolding failed, used to lament for "poor dear dead Searcher, who—, etc., etc." She pulled her bow somewhat too tight, and Sir Benjamin asserted his independence.

Sophia Dove, daughter of Sir Benjamin. She loved Robert Belfield, but was engaged to marry the elder brother Andrew. When, however, the wedding day arrived, Andrew was found to be a married man, and the younger brother became the bridegroom—R. Cumberland, The Brothers (1769).

Dowlas (Daniel), a chandler of Gosport, who trades in "coals, cloth, herrings, linen, candles, eggs, sugar, treacle, tea, and brickdust." This vulgar and illiterate petty shopkeeper is raised to the peerage under the title of "The Right Hon. Daniel Dowlas, Baron Duberly." But scarcely has he entered on his honours, when the "heir-at-law," supposed to have been lost at sea, makes his appearance in the person of Henry Morland. The "heir" settles on Daniel Dowlas an annuity.

Deborah Dowlas, wife of Daniel, and for a short time lady Duberly. She assumes quite the airs and ton of gentility, and tells her husband "as he is a peer, he ought to behave as such."

Dick Dowlas, the son, apprenticed to an attorney at Castleton. A wild young scamp, who can "shoot wild ducks, sling a bar, play at cricket, make punch, catch gudgeons, and dance." His mother says, "he is the sweetest-tempered youth when he has everything his own way." Dick Dowlas falls in love with Cicely Home-spun, and marries her—G. Colman, Heir-at-law (1797).

Mrs. Pope asked me about the dress. I answered 'It should be black bombazine.' I proved to her that not only Deborah Dowlas "but all the rest of the dramatic persons ought to be in mourning." The three Dowlas as relatives of the deceased lord Duberly: 'Henry Morland as the heir-at-law, Dr. Pangloss' as a clergyman, 'Caroline Dormer' for the loss of her father and 'Henrich' as a servant of the Dormer family.—James Smith.

Dowlas (Old Dame), housekeeper to the duke of Buckingham—Sir W. Scott, Peril of the Peaf (time, Charles II.).

Dowling (Captain), a great drunkard, who dies in his cups—Crabbe, Borough, vii (1810).

Old Chaucer doth of Topaz tell Mad Rabelais of Pantagruel
A later third of Dowsabel

M. Dryton Lymphidia

Drac, a sort of fairy in human form, whose abode is in the caverns of rivers. Sometimes these dracs will float like golden cups along a stream to entice bathers, but when the bather attempts to catch at them, the drac draws him under water—South of France Mythology.

Dra'chenfels ("dragon rock"), so called from the dragon killed there by Siegfried, the hero of the Nibelungen-Lied.

Dragon (A), the device on the royal banner of the old British kings. The leader was called the pendragon. Geoffrey of Monmouth says "When Aurelius was king, there appeared a star at Winchester of wonderful magnitude and brightness, darting forth a ray, at the end of which was a flame in form of a dragon." Other ordered two golden dragons to be made, one of which he presented to Winchester, and the other he carried with him as a royal standard. Tennyson says that Arthur's helmet had for crest a golden dragon

they saw
The dragon of the great per dragonship
That crowned the state pavilion of the king.
Tennyson, Gilgamesh

Dragon (The), one of the maïques at Kennaquhair Abbey—Sir W. Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Dragon (The Ped), the personification of "the devil," as the enemy of man—Phineas Fletcher, The Purple Island, ix. (1633).

Dragon of Wantley (i.e. Warn-cliff, in Yorkshire), a skit on the old metrical romances, especially on the old rhyming legend of Sir Bevis. The ballad describes the dragon, its outrages, the flight of the inhabitants, the knight choosing his armour, the damsel, the fight, and the victory. The hero is called "More, of More Hall" (7 r)—Percy, Poems, III in 13.

(H. Carey has a burlesque called The Dragon of Wantley, and calls the hero "Moore, of Moore Hall," 1697-1713.)

Dragon's Hill (Berkshire). The legend says it is here that St. George killed the dragon, but the place assigned for this achievement in the ballad given in Percy's Reliques is "Sylenc, in Libya." Another legend gives Britus (Beyrut) as the place of this encounter.

(In regard to Dragon Hill, according to Saxon annals, it was here that Cedric (founder of the West Saxons) slew Nand the pendergon, with 5000 men.)

Dragon's Teeth. The tale of Jason and Ætëa is a repetition of that of Cadmus.

In the tale of CADMUS, we are told the fountain of Areia (3 syl.) was guarded by a fierce dragon. Cadmus killed the dragon, and sowed its teeth in the earth. From these teeth sprang up armed men called "Sparti," among whom he flung stones, and the armed men fell foul of each other, till all were slain excepting five.

In the tale of JACOB, we are told that having slain the dragon which kept watch over the golden fleece, he sowed its teeth in the ground, and armed men sprang up. Jason cast a stone into the midst of them, whereupon the men attacked each other, and were all slain.

ZOUAK, the dragon slain by Teridun (Shahnámeh).

* * Numerous dragons have no special name. Many are denoted Red, White, Black, Great, etc.

Drama. The earliest European drama since the fall of the Western empire appeared in the middle of the fifteenth century. It is called La Celestina, and is divided into twenty-one acts. The first act, which runs through fifty pages, was composed by Rodrigo Cota, the other twenty are ascribed to Fernando de Rojas. The whole was published in 1510.

The earliest English drama is entitled Ralph Roister Doister, a comedy by Nicholas Udal (before 1551, because mentioned by T. Wilson, in his Rule of Reason, which appeared in 1551).

The second English drama was Gammer Gurton's Needle, by Mr. S. Master of Arts. Warton, in his History of English Poetry (iv. 32), gives 1551 as the date of this comedy, and Wright, in his Historia Histrionica, says it appeared in the reign of Edward VI, who died 1553. It is generally ascribed to bishop Still, but he was only eight years old in 1551.

Drama (Father of the French), J. M. Jodelle (1532-1573).

And not in literature a great Drawcansir
Byron Don Juan xl, 51 (1824)

At length my enemy appeared and I went forward some yards like a Drawcansir but found myself seized with a panic as Paris was when he presented himself to fight with Menchius—Lesage Gil Blas vii, 1 (1735)

Dream Authorship It is said that Coleridge wrote his Kubla Khan from his recollection of a dream

* * Condillac (says Cabanis) concluded in his dreams the reasonings left incomplete at bed-time

Dreams Amongst the ancient Gaels the leader of the army was often determined by dreams or visions in the night The different candidates retired "each to his hill of ghosts, to pass the night, and he to whom a vision appeared was appointed the leader"

Selma's king [Fingal] looked around In his presence we rose in arms But who should lift the shield—for all had claimed the war! The night came down We strove in silence, each to his hill of ghosts, that spirits might descend in our dreams to mark us for the field. We struck the shield of the dead. We raised the hum of songs. We called thrice the ghosts of our fathers. We laid us down for dreams—Osian, Cathlin of Clutha.

Dreams The Indians believe all dreams to be revelations, sometimes made by the familiar genius, and sometimes by the "inner or divine soul" An Indian, having dreamt that his finger was cut off, and it really cut off the next day—Charlevoix, Journal of a Voyage to North America

Dream'er (The Immortal), John Bunyan, whose Pilgrim's Progress is said by him to be a dream (1628-1688)

Driver of Europe The due de Choisenl, minister of Louis XV, was so called by the empress of Russia, because he had spies all over Europe, and ruled by them all the political cabals

Dro'gio, probably Nova Scotia and Newfoundland A Venetian voyager named Antonio Zeno (fourteenth century) so called a country which he discovered It was said to lie south-west of Estotiland (Labrador), but neither Estotiland nor Drogio are recognized by modern geographers, and both are supposed to be wholly, or in a great measure, hypothetical

Dro'mio (The Brothers), two brothers, twins, so much alike that even their nearest friends and masters knew not one from the other They were the servants of two masters, also twins and the exact fac-similes of each other The masters were Antipholus of Ephesus and Antipholus of Syracuse—Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors (1593)

(The Comedy of Errors is borrowed from the Menachmi of Plautus)

Dronsdaughter (Tronda), the old serving-woman of the Yellowlegs—Sir W Scott, The Pirate (time, William III)

Drop Serene (Gutta Serena) It was once thought that this sort of blindness was an incurable extinction of vision by a transparent watery humour distilling on the optic nerve. It caused total blindness, but made no visible change in the eye. It is now known that this sort of blindness arises from obstruction in the capillary nerve-vessels, and in some cases at least is curable. Milton, speaking of his own blindness, expresses a doubt whether it arose from the Gutta Serena or the suffusion of a cataract.

So thick a drop serene" hath quenched their orbs,
Or dim suffusion" veiled.

Milton Paradise Lost III 25 (1665)

Dropping Well, near the Njde, Yorkshire

Drudgeit (Peter), clerk to lord Bladderskate—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Drugger (Abel), a seller of tobacco, artless and gullible in the extreme. He was building a new house, and came to Subtle "the alchemist," to know on which side to set the shop door, how to dispose the shelves so as to ensure most luck, on what days he might trust his customers, and when it would be unlucky for him so to do.—Ben Jonson, The Alchemist (1610)

Thomas Weston was Abel Drugger" himself (1721-1761), but David Garrick was fond of the part also (1716-1779).—C. Dibdin History of the Stage

(This comedy was cut down into a two-act farce, called The Tobacconist, by Francis Gentleman)

Drugget, a rich London haberdasher, who has married one of his daughters to sir Charles Racket. Drugget is "very fond of his garden," but his taste goes no further than a suburban ten-garden, with leaden images, cockney fountains, trees cut into the shapes of animals, and other similar abominations. He is very headstrong, very passionate, and very fond of flattery.

Mrs Drugget, wife of the above. She knows her husband's foibles, and, like a wise woman, never rubs the hair the wrong way.—A Murphy, Three Weeks after Marriage

* * Collins calls James Thomson (author of The Seasons) a druid, meaning a pastoral British poet or "Nature's High Priest."

In yonder grave a Druid lies.

Collins (1746)

Druid (Dr), a man of North Wales, 65 years of age, the travelling tutor of lord Abberville, who was only 25. The doctor is a pedant and antiquary, choleric in temper, and immensely bigoted, wholly without any knowledge of the human heart, or indeed any practical knowledge at all.

Money and trade, I scorn em both. I have traced the Orus and the Po traversed the Rhiphæan Mountains, and pierced into the inmost tesarts of Hindu Tartary. I have followed the ravages of Kooli Chan with rapturous delight. There is a land of wonders finely depopulated. Gloriously laid waste. fields without a hoof to tread em. fruits without a hand to gather em. with such a catalogue of pits, peedles serpents scorpions, caterpillars toads and putterflies. Oh, tis a ravelling contempration indeed to a philosophic mind!—C. Kimberland The Fashionable Lover (1780)

Druid Money, a promise to pay on the Greek Kalends. Patreus says "Druides pecuniam mutuo accipiebant in posteriore vita redditum."

Du Croy and his friend La Grange are desirous to marry two young Indians whose heads are turned by novels. The silly girls fancy the manners of these gentlemen too unaffected and easy to be aristocratic, so the gentlemen read to them their valots, as "the vison of de delict," and "the marquis of Mascarille." The girls are delighted with their titled visitors, but when the game has gone far enough, the masters enter and unmask the trick. By this means the girls are taught a useful lesson, without being subjected to any fatal consequences—Moliere, Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Dudley, a young artist, a diamond assumed by Harry Bertram—Sir W. Scott, Guy Rannering (time, George II.)

Dudley (Captain), a poor English officer, of strict honour, good family, and many accomplishments. He has served his country for thirty years, but can scarcely provide bread for his family.

Captain Dudley, son of captain Dudley. High minded, virtuous, generous, poor, and proud. He falls in love with his cousin Charlotte Pusport, but forbears proposing to her, because he is poor and she is rich. His grandfather's will is in time brought to light by which he becomes the heir of a noble fortune, and he then marries his cousin.

Lois Dudley, daughter of captain Dudley. Young, fair, tall, fresh, and lovely. She is courted by Belcour the rich West Indian, to whom ultimately she is married—Cumberland, The West Indian (1771)

Dudloy Diamond (See) In 1804 a black shepherd named Smart boy brought to his master, Nic Kirk, this diamond, and received for it £200, which he spent him self to drink. Nic Kirk sold it for £1000, and the earl of Dudley gave Mrs. M. Hunt and her son £2000 for it. It weighed 11 the rough 80 carats, but cut it's a heart shape it weighs 11 carats. It is triangular, when shined, it is of great brilliancy. This magnificent diamond, last called the "Sultan" (see), and the "Lion," have all been discovered in Africa since 1808.

Dudu, one of the three beauties of the harem, into which Jean, by the sultan's order, had been admitted in female attire. Next day, the sultan, out of jealousy, ordered that both Dudu and Jean should be stretched in a sack and cast into the sea, but, by the contrivance of Baba the chief eunuch, they effected their escape—Byron, Don Juan, vi. 12, etc.

Duenna (The), a comic opera by R. B. Sheridan (1770). Margaret, the duenna, is placed in charge of Louisa, the daughter of don Jerome. Louisa is in love with don Antonio, a poor nobleman of Seville, but her father resolves to give her in marriage to Don Mendez, a rich Portuguese Jew. As Louisa will not consent to her father's arrangement, he locks her up in her chamber.

and turns the duenna out of doors, but in his impetuous rage he in reality turns his daughter out, and locks up the duenna Isaac arrives, is introduced to the lady, elopes with her, and is duly married. Lonisa flees to the convent of St Catharine, and writes to her father for his consent to her marriage to the man of her choice, and don Jerome, supposing she means the Jew, gives it freely, and she marries Antonio. When they meet at breakfast at the old man's house, he finds that Isaac has married the duenna, Lonisa has married Antonio, and his son has married Clara, but the old man is reconciled, and says, "I am an obstinate old fellow, when I'm in the wrong, but you shall all find me steady in the right."

Duessa (false faith), is the personification of the papacy. She meets the Red Cross Knight in the society of Sansfoy (infidelity), and when the knight slays Sansfoy, she turns to flight. Being overtaken, she says her name is Fidesse (true faith), deceives the knight, and conducts him to the palace of Lucifer, where he encounters Sansjoy (canto 2). Duessa dresses the wounds of the Red Cross Knight, but places Sansjoy under the care of Esculapius in the infernal regions (canto 4). The Red Cross Knight leaves the palace of Lucifer, and Duessa induces him to drink of the "Enervating Fountain," Orgoglio then attacks him, and would have slain him if Duessa had not promised to be his bride. Having cast the Red Cross Knight into a dungeon, Orgoglio dresses his bride in most gorgeous array, puts on her head "a triple crown" (the tiara of the pope), and sets her on a monster beast with "seven heads" (the seven hills of Rome). Una (truth) sends Arthur (England) to rescue the captive knight, and Arthur slays Orgoglio, wounds the beast, releases the knight, and strips Duessa of her finery (the Reformation), whereupon she flies into the wilderness to conceal her shame (canto 7) — Spenser, Fairy Queen, i (1590).

Duessa, in bk v, allegorizes Mary queen of Scots. She is arraigned by zeal before queen Mercilla (Elizabeth), and charged with high treason. Zeal says he shall pass by for the present "her counsels false conspired" with Blandamour (earl of Northumberland), and Paridel (earl of Westmoreland, leaders of the insurrection of 1569), as that wicked plot came to naught, and the false Duessa was now "an untitled queen." When Zeal had finished, an old sage named the Kingdom's Care (lord Burghley) spoke, and opinions were divided. Authority, Law of Nations, and Religion thought Duessa guilty, but Pity, Danger, Nobility of Birth, and Grief pleaded in her behalf. Zeal then charges the prisoner with murder, sedition, adultery, and lewd impiety, whereupon the sentence of the court was given against her. Queen Mercilla, being called on to pass sentence, was so overwhelmed with grief that she rose and left the court — Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 9 (1596).

Duff (Jamie), the idiot boy attending Mrs Bertram's funeral — Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II).

Duglas, the scene of four Arthurian battles. The Douglas is said to fall into the estuary of the Pibble. The Paris MS and Henry of Huntingdon says, "Douglas qui est in regione Innus." But where is "Innus"? There is a township called "Ince," a mile south-west of Wigan, and Mr Whitaker says, "six cwt of horse-shoes were taken up from a space of ground near that spot during the formation of a canal," so that this "Ince" is supposed to be the place referred to.

Duke (My lord), a duke's servant, who assumes the airs and title of his master, and is addressed as "Your grace," or "My lord duke." He was first a country cowboy, then a wig-maker's apprentice, and then a duke's servant. He could neither write nor read, but was a great coxcomb, and set up for a tip-top fine gentleman — Rev J Townley, High Life Below Stairs (1763).

Duke (The Iron), the duke of Wellington, also called "The Great Duke" (1769-1852).

Duke and Duchess, in pt II of Don Quixote, who play so many sportive tricks on "the Knight of the Woeful Countenance," were don Carlos de Borja count of Picallo and donna Maria of Aragon duchess of Villahermosa his wife, in whose right the count held extensive estates on the banks of the Ebro, among others a country seat called Buena'ia, the place referred to by Cervantes (1615).

Duke of Milan, a tragedy by Massinger (1622). A play evidently in imitation of Shakespeare's Othello, "Sforza" is Othello, "Francesco," Iago, "Marcelia," Desdemona, and "Eugenia," Emilia Sforza "the More" [sic] doted on Marcelia his young bride, who amply returned his love Francesco, Sforza's favourite, being left lord protector of Milan during a temporary absence of the duke, tried to corrupt Marcelia, but failing in this, accused her to Sforza of wantonness. The duke, believing his favourite, slew his beautiful young bride. The cause of Francesco's villainy was that the duke had seduced his sister Eugenia.

* * Shakespeare's play was produced 1611, about eleven years before Massinger's tragedy. In act v. 1 we have, "Men's injuries we write in brass," which brings to mind Shakespeare's line, "Men's evil manners live in brass, their virtues we write in water."

(Cumberland reproduced this drama, with some alterations, in 1780.)

Duke Coombe, William Coombe, author of Dr Syntax, and translator of The Devil upon Two Sticks, from Le Diable Boiteux of Lesage. He was called duke from the splendour of his dress, the profusion of his table, and the magnificence of his deportment. The last fifteen years of his life were spent in the King's Bench (1741-1823).

Duke Street (Portman Square, London). So called from William Bentinck, second duke of Portland. (See DUCHESS STREET.)

Duke Street (Strand, London). So named from George Villiers, duke of Buckingham.

(For other dukes, see the surname or titular name.)

Duke's, a fashionable theatre in the reign of Charles II. It was in Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields. So named in compliment to James duke of York (James II.), its great patron.

Dulcamara (Dr), an itinerant physician, noted for his pomposity, very boastful, and a thorough charlatan — Donizetti, L'Elisir d'Amore (1832).

Dulcarnon, at my wit's end — Chaucer.

Dulcifluous Doctor, Antony Andreas, a Spanish minorite of the Duns Scotus school (*-1320).

Dulcinea del Toboso, the lady of don Quixote's devotion. She was a fresh-coloured country wench, of an adjacent village, with whom the don was once in love. Her real name was Aldonza Lorenzo. Her father was Lorenzo Corchuelo, and her mother Aldonza Nogalís. Sancho Panza describes her in pt. I. ii. 11 — Cervantes, Don Quixote, I. i. 1 (1605).

Her flowing hair "saw the knight" is of gold, her forehead the Pnyxian fields, her eyebrows two celestial arches, her eyes a pair of glorious suns, her cheeks two bolts of roses, her lips two coral portals that guard her teeth of Oriental pearl, her neck is alabaster, her hands are polished ivory, and her bosom whiter than the new fallen snow.

She is not a descendant of the ancient Cull, Curtill, and Scipios of Rome; nor of the modern Colonnas and Orsini, nor of the Montecados and Bequerones of Catalonia, nor of the Rebellas and Villanovas of Valencia, neither is she a descendant of the Lalafoxas, Newens, Rocabertis, Corellas, Lunas, Alagonas, Ureñas, Foyes, and Carras of Aragon, neither does the lady Dulcinea descend from the Cenlas, Manriquez, Mendozas, and Guzmans of Castille, nor from the Veneçistros, Pallas, and Veneçer of Portugal, but she derives her origin from the family of Toboso de la Mancha, most illustrious of all. — Cervantes, Don Quixote c. I. ii. 5 (1605).

Ask you for whom my tears do flow so!

'Tis for Dulcinea del Toboso.

Don Quixote L. III. 11 (1605)

Dull, a constable. — Shakespeare, Force's Labour's Lost (1594).

Dumain, a French lord in attendance on Ferdinand king of Navarre. He agreed to spend three years with the king in study, during which time no woman was to approach the court. Of course, the compact was broken as soon as made, and Dumain fell in love with Katharine. When, however, he proposed marriage, Katharine deferred her answer for twelve months and a day, hoping by that time "his face would be more bearded," for she said, "I'll mark no words that smooth-faced wooers say."

Du'marin, the husband of Cym'oent, and father of Marinel — Spenser, Fairy Queen, iii. 4.

Dumas (Alexandre D), in 1845, published sixty volumes

The most industrious copyist, writing 12 hours a day can with difficulty do 3000 letters in an hour which gives him 45 000 per diem or 60 pages of a romance. Thus he could copy 5 volumes octavo per month and 60 in a year supposing that he did not lose one second of time, but worked without ceasing 12 hours every day throughout the entire year — De Mirecourt Dumas Père (1877)

Dumb Ox (The) St Thomas Aquinas was so called by his fellow-students at Cologne, from his taciturnity and dreaminess. Sometimes called "The Great Dumb Ox of Sicily." He was large-bodied, fat, with a brown complexion, and a large head partly bald

Of a truth it almost makes me laugh
To see men leaving the golden grain
To gather in piles the pitiful chaff
That old Peter Lombard thrashed with his brain
To have it caught up and tossed again
On the horns of the Dumb Ox of Cologne.

Longfellow The Golden Legend.

And presently a halter got,
Made of the best strong hempen tear
And ere a cat could lick his ear
Had tied him up with as much art
As Dun himself could do for's heart.

Cotton Virgil Travestied, iv (1677)

Dun Cow (The), slain by sir Guy of Warwick on Dunsmore Heath, was the kept by a grant in Mitchel Fold

[middle-fold], Shropshire Its milk was inexhaustible. One day an old woman, who had filled her pail, wanted to fill her sieve also with its milk, but this so enraged the cow that it broke away, and wandered to Dunsmore, where it was killed

 A huge tusk, probably an elephant's, is still shown at Warwick Castle as one of the horns of this wonderful cow

Dunbar and March (George earl of), who deserted to Henry IV of England, because the betrothal of his daughter Elizabeth to the king's eldest son was broken off by court intrigue

Elizabeth Dunbar, daughter of the earl of Dunbar and March, betrothed to prince Robert duke of Rothsay, eldest son of Robert III of Scotland. The earl of Douglas contrived to set aside this betrothal in favour of his own daughter Elizabeth, who married the prince, and became duchess of Rothsay — Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Duncan "the Meek," king of Scotland, was son of Crynn, and grandson of Malcolm II, whom he succeeded on the throne. Macbeth was the son of the younger sister of Duncan's mother, and hence Macbeth and Duncan were first cousins. Sueno king of Norway having invaded Scotland, the command of the army was entrusted to Macbeth and Branko, and so great was their success that only ten men of the invading army were left alive. After the battle, king Duncan paid a visit to Macbeth in his castle of Inverness, and was there murdered by his host. The successor to the throne was Duncan's son Malcolm, but Macbeth usurped the crown — Shakespeare, Macbeth (1606)

—Mrs. Oulphant, Thackeray, ii. 3

Duns'tan (St), patron saint of goldsmiths and jewellers. He was a smith, and worked up all sorts of metals in his cell near Glastonbury Church. It was in this cell that, according to legend, Satan had a gossip with the saint, and Dunstan caught his sable majesty by the nose with a pair of red-hot forceps

Dunthalmo, lord of Teutha (the Tweed). He went "in his pride against Rathmor" chief of Clutha (the Clyde), but being overcome, "his rage arose," and he went "by night with his warriors" and slew Rathmor in his banquet hall louches with pity for his two young sons (Calthon and Colmar), he took them to his own house and brought them up. "They bent the bow in his presence, and went forth to his wars." But observing that their countenances fell, Dunthalmo began to be suspicious of the young men, and shut them up in two separate caves on the banks of the Tweed, where neither "the sun penetrated by day nor the moon by night." Colmal (the daughter of Dunthalmo), disguised as a young warrior, loosed Calthon from his bonds, and fled with him to the court of Fingal, to crave aid for the liberation of Colmar. Fingal sent his son Ossian with 300 men to effect this object, but Dunthalmo, hearing of their approach, gathered together his strength and slew Colmar. He also seized Calthon, mourning for his brother, and bound him to an oak. At daybreak Ossian moved to the spot, slew

Dunthalmo, and having released Calthon, "gave him to the white-bosomed Colmal"—Ossian, Calthon and Colmal

Dupely (Sir Charles), a man who prided himself on his discernment of character, and defied any woman to entangle him in matrimony, but he mistook lady Bab Lardoon, a votary of fashion, for an unsophisticated country maiden, and proposed marriage to her

I should like to see the woman," he says, that could entangle me. Show me a woman, and at the first glance I will discover the whole extent of her artifice."
—Burpyne The Maid of the Oaks i. 1.

Eden (The Garden of) There is a region of Bavaria so called, because, like Eden, it is watered by four streams, viz, the White Main, the Eger, the Saale, and the Naab.

In the Korân the word Eden means "everlasting abode." Thus in ch. ix we read, "God promiseth to true believers gardens of perpetual abode," literally "gardens of Eden."

Eden, in America A dismal swamp, the climate of which generally proved fatal to the poor dupes who were induced to settle there through the swindling transactions of general Scadder and general Choke. So dismal and dangerous was the place, that even Mark Tapley was satisfied to have found at last a place where he could "come out jolly with credit."—C. Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Eden of Germany (Das Eden Deutschlands) Baden is so called on account of its mountain scenery, its extensive woods, its numerous streams, its mild climate, and its fertile soil. The valley of the Rhine, in the grand-duchy, is locally called "Hell Valley" (Höllenthal). Between this and the lake Constance lies what is called "The Kingdom of Heaven."

Edenhall (The Luck of), an old painted goblet, left by the faunes on St. Outhbert's Well in the garden of Edenhall. The superstition is that if ever this goblet is lost or broken, there will be no more luck in the family. The goblet is in the possession of sir Christopher Musgrave, bart., Edenhall, Cumberland.

 Longfellow has a poem on The Luck of Edenhall, translated from Uhland.

Edgar (959-770), "king of all the English," was not crowned till he had reigned thirteen years (A. D. 973). Then the ceremony was performed at Bath. After this he sailed to Chester, and eight of his vassal kings came with their fleets to pay him homage, and swear fealty to him by land and sea. The eight are Kenneth (King of Scots), Malcolm (of Cumberland), Maccus (of the Isles), and five Welsh princes, whose names were Dufnal, Siferth, Huwal, Jacob, and Juchil. The eight kings rowed Edgar in a boat (while he acted as steersman) from Chester to St. John's, where they offered prayer, and then returned.

At Chester while he [Edgar] lived, at more than kingly charge,

Eight tributary kings there rowed him in his barge
Dryton, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Edgar, son of Gloucester, and his lawful heir. He was disinherited by Edmund, natural son of the earl.—Shakespeare, King Lear (1605).

 This was one of the characters of Robert Wilks (1670-1732), and also of Charles Kemble (1774-1854).

Edgar, master of Ravenswood, son of Allan of Ravenswood (a decayed Scotch nobleman). Lucy Ashton, being attacked by a wild bull, is saved by Edgar, who shoots it, and the two, falling in love with each other, plight their mutual troth, and exchange love-tokens at the "Mermaid's Fountain." While Edgar is absent in France on State affairs, sir William Ashton, being deprived of his office as lord keeper, is induced to promise his daughter Lucy in marriage to Frank Hayston, laird of Bucklaw, and they are married, but next morning, Bucklaw is found wounded, and the bride hidden in the chimney-corner, insane. Lucy dies in convulsions, but Bucklaw recovers and goes abroad. Edgar is lost in the quicksands at Kelpies Flow, in accordance with an ancient prophecy.—Sir W. Scott, Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

 In the opera, Edgar is made to stab himself.

Edgar, an attendant on prince Robert of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Edgardo, master of Ravenswood, in love with Lucia di Lammermoor [Lucy Ashton]. While absent in France on State affairs, the lady is led to believe him faithless, and consents to marry the laird of Bucklaw, but she stabs him on the bridal night, goes mad, and dies. Edgardo also stabs himself.—Donizetti, Lucia di Lammermoor (1835).

 In the novel called The Bride of Lammermoor, by sir W. Scott, Edgar is lost in the quicksands at Kelpies Flow, in accordance with an ancient prophecy.

Edgeworth (L'Abbé), who attended Louis XVI. to the scaffold, was called "Mons de Firmount," a corruption of Fairmount, in Longford (Ireland), where the Edgeworths had extensive domains.

Edging (Missess), a prying, mischief-making witing-woman, in The Careless Husband, by Colley Cibber (1701).

Edina, a poetical form of the word Edinburgh. It was first employed by Buchanan (1568-1592).

Edith, daughter of Baldwin the tutor of Rollo and Otto dukes of Normandy—Berumont and Fletcher, The Bloody Brother (1639)

Edith, the "maid of Lorn" (Argyllshire), was on the point of being married to lord Ronald, when Robert, Edward, and Isabel Bruce sought shelter at the castle Edith's brother recognized Robert Bruce, and being in the English interest, a quarrel ensued The abbot refused to marry the bridal pair amidst such discord Edith fled, and in the character of a page had many adventures, but at the restoration of peace, after the battle of Bannockburn, was duly married to lord Ronald—Sir W Scott, Lord of the Isles (1815)

Edith (The lady), mother of Athelstane "the Unready" (thane of Coningsburgh)—Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

Edith [GRANGER], daughter of the Hon Mrs Skewton, married at the age of 18 to colonel Granger of "Ours," who died within two years, when Edith and her mother lived as adventuresses Edith became Mr Dombey's second wife, but the marriage was altogether an unhappy one, and she eloped with Mr Carker to Dijon, where she left him, having taken this foolish step merely to annoy her husband for the slights to which he had subjected her On leaving Carker she went to live with her cousin Keenly, in the south of England—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1816)

Edith Plantagenet (The lady), called "The Fair Maid of Anjou," a kinswoman of Richard I, and attendant on queen Bereng'ra She married David earl of Huntingdon (prince royal of Scotland), and is introduced by sir W Scott in The Talisman (1825)

Edmund, natural son of the earl of Gloucester Both Goneril and Regan (daughters of king Lear) were in love with him Regan, on the death of her husband designed to marry Edmund, but Goneril, out of jealousy, poisoned her sister Regan—Shakespeare, King Lear (1605)

Edonian Band (The), the priestesses and other ministers of Bacchus, so called from Edo'nns, a mountain of Thrace, where the rites of the wine-god were celebrated

Accept the rites your bounty well may claim,
Nor heed the scoffings of th' Edonian band,
Akenside Hymn to the Falsads (1767)

Ednie, a domestic at Hereward's barracks—Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Edward, brother of Hereward the Varianing guard He was slain in battle—Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Edward (Sir) He commits a murder, and keeps a narrative of the transaction in an iron chest Wilford, a young man who acts as his secretary, was one day caught prying into this chest, and sir Edward's first impulse was to kill him, but on second thoughts he swore the young man to secrecy, and told him the story of the murder Wilford, unable to live under the suspicious eye of his master, ran away, but was hunted down by sir Edward, and accused of robbery The whole transaction now became public, and Wilford was acquitted—G Colman, The Iron Chest (1796)

* * This drama is based on Goodwin's novel of Caleb Williams "Williams" is called Wilford in the drama, and "Falkland" sir Edward Mortimer

Somewhat who a mind was always in a ferment, was wont to commit the most ridiculous mistakes. Thus when sir Edward "says to Wilford You may have noticed in my library a chest," he transposed the words thus You may have noticed in my chest a library and the house was convulsed with laughter—Russell Representative Actors (appendix)

Edward II, a tragedy by C Marlowe (1592), imitated by Shakespeare in his Richard II (1697) Probably most readers would prefer Marlowe's noble tragedy to Shakespeare's

Edward Street (Cavendish Square, London), is so called from Edward second earl of Oxford and Mortimer. (See HENRIETTA STREET)

Ed'widge, wife of William Tell —
Rossini, Guglielmo Tell (1829)

Edwin "the minstrel," a youth living in romantic seclusion, with a great thirst for knowledge. He lived in Gothic days in the north country, and fed his flocks on Scotia's mountains.

And yet poor Edwin was no vulgar boy
Deep thought oft seemed to fix his infant eye—
Dainties he heeded not, nor gauds nor toys
Save one short pipe of rudest minstrelsy
Silent when glad affectionate, yet shy
And now he laughed aloud, yet none knew why
The neighbours stared and sighed, yet blessed the lad
Some deemed him wondrous wise and some believed him mad.

Beattie, The Minstrel I. (1773)

Edwin and Angelina. Angelina was the daughter of a wealthy lord, "beside the Tyne." Her hand was sought in marriage by many suitors, amongst whom was Edwin, "who had neither wealth nor power, but he had both wisdom and worth." Angelina loved him, but "trifled with him," and Edwin, in despair, left her, and retired from the world. One day, Angelina, in boy's clothes, asked hospitality at a hermit's cell, she was kindly entertained, told her tale, and the hermit proved to be Edwin. From that hour they never parted more.—Goldsmith, The Hermit

A correspondent accuses me of having taken this ballad from The Friar of Orders Gray but if there is any resemblance between the two Mr Percy's ballad is taken from mine. I read my ballad to Mr Percy and he told me afterwards that he had taken my plan to form the fragments of Shakespeare into a ballad of his own.—Signed, O Goldsmith 1767

Edwin and Emma. Emma was a rustic beauty of Stanemore, who loved Edwin "the pride of swains," but Edwin's sister, out of envy, induced his father, "a sordid man," to forbid any intercourse between Edwin and the cottage. Edwin pined away, and being on the point of death, requested he might be allowed to see Emma. She came and said to him, "My Edwin, live for me," but on her way home she heard the death bell toll. She just contrived to reach her cottage door, cried to her mother, "He's gone!" and fell down dead at her feet.—Mallet, Edwin and Emma (a ballad)

Ed'yrn, son of Nudd. He ousted the earl of Yn'iol from his earldom, and tried to win L'nd the earl's daughter, but failing in this, became the evil genius of the gentle earl. Ultimately, being sent to the court of King Arthur, he became quite a changed man—from a malicious "sparrow-hawk" he was converted into a courteous gentleman—Tennison, Idylls of the King ("L'nd")

- Eel. The best in the world are those of Aneum, a river in that division of Lincolnshire called Lindsey (the highest part). The best pike are from the Witham, in the division of Lincolnshire called Kesteven (in the west).

As Kesteven doth boast her Wythum, so have I
My Aneum, whose fame as far doth fly
For fat and dainty eels as her's doth for her pike
Drayton, Polyolbion, xxv (1632)

Efeso (St), a saint honoured in Pisa. He was a Roman officer [Ephesus] in the service of Diocletian, whose reign was marked by a great persecution of the Christians. This Efeso or Ephesus was appointed to see the decree of the emperor against the obnoxious sect carried out in the island of Sardinia, but being warned in a dream not to persecute the servants of the Lord, both he and his friend Potito embraced Christianity, and received a standard from Michael the archangel himself. On one occasion, being taken captive, St Efeso was cast into a furnace of fire, but received no injury, whereas those who cast him in were consumed by the flames. Ultimately, both Efeso and Potito suffered martyrdom, and were buried in the island of Sardinia. When, however, that island was conquered by Pisa in the eleventh century, the relics of the two martyrs were carried off and interred in the dome of Pisa, and the banner of St Efeso was thenceforth adopted as the national ensign of Pisa.

Egalite (Philippe), the duc d'Orléans, father of Louis Philippe king of France. He himself assumed this "title" when he joined the revolutionary party, whose motto was "Liberty, Fraternity, and Egalité" (born 1747, guillotined 1793).

Egeus (3 syl), father of Her'mia. He summoned her before The'seus (2 syl) duke of Athens, because she refused to marry Demetrius, to whom he had promised her in marriage, and he requested that she might either be compelled to marry him or else be dealt with "according to the law," i.e. "either to die the death," or else to "endure the livery of a nun, and live a barren sister all her life." Her'mia refused to submit to an "unwished joke," and fled from Athens with Lysander. Demetrius, seeing that Her'mia disliked him but that Hel'ena doted on him, consented to abandon the one and wed the other. When Egeus was informed thereof, he withdrew his summons, and gave his consent to the union of his daughter with Lysander—Shakespeare, Midsummer Night's Dream (1592)

* * S Knowles, in The Wife, makes the plot turn on a similar "law of marriage" (1833)

Egil, brother of Weland, a great archer. One day, king Niding commanded him to shoot at an apple placed on the head of his own son. Egil selected two arrows, and being asked why he wanted two, replied, "One to shoot thee with, O tyrant, if I fail."

(This is one of the many stories similar to that of William Tell, q v)

Egilo'na, the wife of Roderick last of the Gothic kings of Spain. She was very beautiful, but cold-hearted, vain, and fond of pomp. After the fall of Roderick, Egilona married Abdul-Aziz, the Moorish governor of Spain, and when Abdul-Aziz was killed by the Moorish rebels, Egilona fell also.

The popular race
Fell on them both; and they to whom her name
Had been a mark for mockery and reproach,
Smoldered with human horror at her fate.
Southey Roderick, etc. xxi (1814)

Eg'la, a female Moor, servant to Amaranta (wife of Bar'tolus, the covetous lawyer)—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Spanish Curate (1622)

Eg'lamour (Sir) or SIR EGLAMORE of Artoys, a knight of Arthurian romance. Sir I. glamour and sir Pleindamour have no French original, although the names themselves are French.

Eg'lamour, the person who aids Silvia, daughter of the duke of Milan, in her escape—Shakespeare, The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594)

Eg'lantine (3 syl), daughter of king Pepin, and bride of her cousin Valentine (brother of Orson). She soon died—Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century)

Eg'lantine (Madame), the prioress, good-natured, wholly ignorant of the world, vain of her delicacy of manner at table, and fond of lap-dogs. Her dainty oath was "By Saint Eloy!" She "entuned the service sweetly in her nose," and spoke French "after the scolo of Stratford-atte-Bowe"—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales (1388)

Egypt. The head-gear of the king of Upper Egypt was a high conical white cap, terminating in a knob at the top. That of the king of Lower Egypt was red. If a king ruled over both countries, he wore both caps, but that of Lower Egypt was placed outside. This composite head-dress was called the pschent.

Egypt, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, means France.

Egypt and Tyrus [Holland] intercept your trade.
Part I. (1691).

Egyptian Disposition (An), a thievish propensity, "gipsy" being a contracted form of Egyptian.

I no sooner saw it was money than my Egyptian disposition prevailed and I was seized with a desire of stealing it.—Lesage On the Sea, x. 10 (1735).

Egyptian Thief (The), Thy'amus, a native of Memphis. Knowing he must die, he tried to kill Chariclea, the woman he loved.

Why should I not had I the heart to do it,
Like to th' Egyptian thief at point of death
Kill what I love?

Shakespeare Twelfth Night act v sc. 1 (1614)

Eighth Wonder (The). When Gil Blas reached Pennafior, a parasite entered his room in the inn, hugged him with great energy, and called him "the eighth wonder." When Gil Blas replied that he did not know his name had spread so far, the parasite exclaimed, "How! we keep a register of all the celebrated names within twenty leagues, and have no doubt Spain will one day be as proud of you as Greece was of the seven sages." After this, Gil Blas could do no less than ask the man to sup with him. Omelet after omelet was despatched, trout was called for, bottle followed bottle, and when the parasite was gorged to satiety, he rose and said, "Signor Gil Blas, don't believe yourself to be the eighth wonder of the world because a hungry man would feast by flattering your vanity." So saying, he stalked away with a laugh—Lesage, Gil Blas, i. 2 (1715).

(This incident is copied from Aleman's romance of Guzman d'Alfarache, q v)

Eikon Basilikê (4 syl), the portraiture of a king (i.e. Charles I), once attributed to king Charles himself, but now admitted to be the production of Dr John Gauden, who (after the restoration) was first created bishop of Exeter, and then of Worcester (1603-1662).

In the Eikon Basilikê a strain of majestic melancholy is kept up but the personated sovereign is rather too theatrical for real nature the language is too rhetorical and amplified the periods too artificially elaborated.—Hallam Literature of Europe iii. 662.

(Milton wrote his Eikonoclastês in answer to Dr Gauden's Eikon Basilikê.)

Eimer'jar, the hall of Odin, and asylum of warriors slain in battle. It had 540 gates, each sufficiently wide to admit eight men abreast to pass through — Scandinavian Mythology

Einion (Father), chaplain to Gwynwyn prince of Powys-land — Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Elvir, a Danish maid, who assumes boy's clothing, and waits on Harold "the Dauntless," as his page. Subsequently, her sex is discovered, and Harold marries her — Sir W Scott, Harold the Dauntless (1817)

Elain, sister of King Arthur by the same mother. She married Sir Nentres of Carlot, and was by King Arthur the mother of Mordred. (See Elvin). — Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 (1470)

* * In some of the romances there is great confusion between Elain (the sister) and Morgause (the half-sister) of Arthur. Both are called the mother of Mordred, and both are also called the wife of Lot. Thus, however, is a mistake. Elain was the wife of Sir Nentres, and Morgause of Lot, and if Gawain, Agravain, Gareth, and Gaheris were [half]-brothers of Mordred, as we are told over and over again, then Morgause and not Elain was his mother. Tennyson makes Bellicent the wife of Lot, but this is not in accordance with any of the legends collected by Sir T Malory.

Elaine (Dame), daughter of King Pelles (2 syl) "of the forage country," and the unwedded mother of Sir Galahad by Sir Lancelot du Lac — Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, iii 2 (1470)

Elaine, daughter of King Brandegoris, by whom Sir Bors de Ganis had a child.

For all women was Sir Bors a virgin save for one the daughter of King Brandegoris, on whom he had a child. Elaine save for her Sir Bors was a clean maid. — Sir T Malory History of Prince Arthur iii. 4 (1470)

* * It is by no means clear from the history whether Elaine was the daughter of King Brandegoris, or the daughter of Sir Bors and granddaughter of King Brandegoris.

Elaine (2 syl), the strong contrast of Guinevere. Guinevere's love for Lancelot was gross and sensual, Elaine's was platonic and pure as that of a child, but both were masterful in their strength. Elaine is called "the lily maid of Astolat" (Guildford), and knowing that Lancelot was pledged to celibacy, she pined and died. According to her dying request, her dead body was placed on a bed in a barge, and was thus conveyed by a dumb servant to the palace of King Arthur. A letter was handed to the King, telling the tale of Elaine's love, and he ordered her story to be blazoned on her tomb — Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, iii. 123 (1470)

El'amites (3 syl), Persians. So called from I'am, son of Shem.

Elberich, the most famous dwarf of German romance — The Heldenbuch

El'bow, a well-meaning but foolish constable — Shakespeare, Measure for Measure (1603)

Elden Hole, in Derbyshire Park, said to be fathomless.

El Dora'do, the "golden city." So the Spaniards called Man'ha of Guari'na.

Gallat, whose great city Geryon's sons
Call "El Dorado."
Milton Paradise Lost xi 411 (1633)

El'eonor, queen-consort of Henry II, alluded to by the presbyterian minister in Woodstock, v (1826)

Believe me young man thy servant was more likely to see villains than to dream idle dreams in that argument for I have always heard that next to Cassimond's Power in which she played the wanton and was afterwards poisoned by queen Eleanor Victor Lee's chamber was the place peculiarly the haunt of evil spirits. — Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time Commonwealth)

Eleanor Crosses, twelve or fourteen crosses erected by Edward I in the various towns where the body of his queen rested, when it was conveyed from Hereford, near Lincoln, to Westminster. The three that still remain are Geddington, Northampton, and Waltham.

(In front of the South-Eastern Railway station, Strand, London, is a model of the Charing Cross, of the original dimensions.)

Eleazar the Moor, insolent, bloodthirsty, lustful, and vindictive, like "Aaron," in [Shakespeare's?] Titus Andronicus. The lascivious queen of Spain is in love with this monster — C Marlowe, Lust's Dominion or The Lascivious Queen (1588)

Eleazar, a famous mathematician, who cast out devils by tying to the nose of the possessed a mystical ring, which the demon no sooner smelled than he abandoned the victim. He performed before the emperor Vespasian, and to prove that something came out of the possessed, he commanded the demon in making off to upset a pitcher of water, which it did.

I imagine if Eleazar's ring had been put under their no-er, w^e should have seen devils issue with their breath, so loud were these disputants.—Leage Gill Blas v 12

Elector (The Great), Frederick William of Brandenburg (1620–1688)

Elein, wife of king Ban of Benwick (Brittany), and mother of sir Lancelot and sir Lionel (See FLAIR)—Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 60 (1470)

Eleven Thousand Virgins (The), the virgins who followed St Ursula in her flight towards Rome. They were all massacred at Cologne by a party of Huns, and even to the present hour "their bones" are exhibited to visitors through windows in the wall.

A calendar in the Freisingen codex notices them as "SS M XI VIRGINUM," that is, eleven virgin martyrs, but "M" (martyrs) being taken for 1000, we get 11,000. It is furthermore remarkable that the number of names known of these virgins is eleven: (1) Ursula, (2) Sencia, (3) Gregoria, (4) Pinchos, (5) Martha, (6) Sula, (7) Brittola, (8) Saturnia, (9) Rabica or Sabatia, (10) Saturia or Sturnia, and (11) Palladia.

Elfenreigen [el f'n-r-i gn] (4 syl.) or Alpleich, that weird music with which Bunting, the pied piper of Hamelin, led forth the rats into the river Weser, and the children into a cave in the mountain Koppenberg. The song of the sirens is so called (Reigen, a dance and the music thereof).

Elfeta, wife of Cambuscan' king of Tartary.

Elflida or ÆTHELFLEDA, daughter of king Alfred, and wife of Æthelred chief of that part of Mercia not claimed by the Danes. She was a woman of enormous energy and masculine mind. At the death of her husband, she ruled over Mercia, and proceeded to fortify city after city, as Bridgenorth, Tamworth, Warwick, Hertford, Witham, and so on. Then, attacking the Danes, she drove them from place to place, and kept them from molesting her.

When Elflida up-grew
The pulssant Danish powers victoriously pursued
And resolutely here thro' their thick squadrons hewed
Her way into the north.

Drayton Polyolbion xii. (1613)

Elfthryth or Ælfthryth, daughter of Ordgar, noted for her great beauty. King Edgar sent Æthelwald, his friend, to ascertain if she were really as beautiful as report made her out to be. When Æthelwald saw her he fell in love with her, and then, returning to the king, said she was not handsome enough for the king, but was rich enough to make a very eligible wife for himself. The king assented to the match, and became godfather to the first child, who was called Edgar. One day the king told his friend he intended to pay him a visit, and Æthelwald revealed to his wife the story of his deceit, imploring her at the same time to conceal her beauty. But Elfthryth, extremely indignant, did all she could to set forth her beauty. The king fell in love with her, slew Æthelwald, and married the widow.

A similar story is told by Herodotus. Præaspis being the lady's name, and Kambysses the king's.

Elgin Marbles, certain statues and bas-reliefs collected by lord Elgin, and purchased of him by the British Government for £35,000, to be placed in the British Museum.

(They are chiefly fragments of the Parthenon of Athens.)

Elgitha, a female attendant at Rotherwood on the lady Rowena—Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I).

Elia, pseudonym of Charles Lamb, author of the Essays of Elia (1823)—London Magazine.

El'ab, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is Henry Bennet, earl of Arlington. As El'ab befriended David (1 Chron xii 9), so the earl befriended Charles II.

Hard the task to do El'ab right

(1632).

El'ian God (The), Bacchus. An error for 'Eleuon, i.e. "the god Lilæus" (3 syl.) Bacchus was called Lilæus from the Bacchic cry, lilæu!

As when with crown'd cups unto the El'ian god
Those priests high orgies held

Drayton Polyolbion, vi. (1612)

El'idure (3 syl.), surnamed "the Pious," brother of Gorboduc, and one of the five sons of Morvidus (qv). He resigned the crown to his brother Arthgallo, who had been deposed. Ten years afterwards, Arthgallo died, and El'idure was again advanced to the throne, but was deposed and imprisoned by his two younger brothers. At the death of these two brothers, El'idure was taken from prison, and mounted the British throne.

for the third time—Geoffrey, British History, iii 17, 18 (1170)

Then Elmore again covered with opprobrious praise
As he a brother raised by brothers was denied
And put into the Tower but the purgers dead
Thence was the British crown set on his reverend head.
Written Polphelon vii (1817)

* * Wordsworth has a poem on this subject

Elijah fed by Ravens While Elijah was at the brook Cherith, in concealment, ravens brought him food every morning and evening—1 Kings xiii 6

A strange parallel is recorded of Wyatt, in the reign of queen Mary. The queen cast him into prison and when he was nearly starved to death, a cat appeared at the window-grating, and dropped into his hand a pigeon, which the warden cool ed for him. This was repeated daily.

El'im, the guardian angel of Lebbæus (3 syl) the apostle Lebbæus, the softest and most tender of the twelve, at the death of Jesus, "sank under the burden of his grief"—Klopstock, The Messiah, iii (1748)

Falconer The Sulphureck, iii 4 (1777)

Elis'abat, a famous surgeon, who attended queen Madari'ma in all her solitary wanderings and was her sole companion—Amadis of Gaul (fifteenth century)

Elisabeth ou Les Exiles de Sibérie a tale by S R dame Cottin (1773-1807) The family being exiled for some political offence, Elizabeth walked all the way from Siberia to Russia, to crave pardon of the czar. She obtained her prayer, and the family returned.

Elise (2 syl), the motherless child of Harpagon the miser. She was affianced to Valere, by whom she had been "rescued from the waves." Valere turns out to be the son of don Thomas d'Albarré, a wealthy nobleman of Naples—Molière, L'Arare (1667)

Elis'sa, step-sister of Medi'na and Perissa. They could never agree upon any subject.—Spenser, Fairy Queen, ii. 2 (1590)

"Medina" (the golden mean), "Thessa" and "Perissa" (the two extremes)

Elxir Vitæ, a drug which was once thought would ensure perpetual life and health

He that has once the flower of life
The perfect July which we call elixir,
Is its virtue
Can confer honour, love, respect, long life
Give safety, labour, rest and sleep
To whom he will. In eight and twenty days
He'll make an old man of fourscore a child.
Ben Jonson, The Alchemist iii (1610)

Elizabeth (The queen), bright, imperious, but devoted to her people. She loved the earl of Essex, and, when she heard that he was married to the countess of Rutland, exclaimed that she never "knew sorrow before." The queen gave Essex a ring after his rebellion, saying, "Here, from my finger take this ring, a pledge of mercy, and whosoever you send it back, I swear that I will grant whatever boon you ask." After his condemnation, Essex sent the ring to the queen by the countess of Nottingham, craving that her most gracious majesty would spare the life of lord Southampton, but the countess, from jealousy, did not give it to the queen. However, the queen sent a reprieve for Essex, but Burleigh took care that it came too late, and the earl was beheaded as a traitor—Henry Jones, The Earl of Essex (1715)

Elizabeth (Queen), introduced by Sir W Scott in his novel called Kennelworth

Elizabeth of Hungary (St), patron saint of queens, being herself a queen. Her day is July 9 (1207-1231)

Ellesmere (Mistress), the head domestic of lady Peveril—Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Elihot (Hobbe, i e Halbert), farmer at the Hough-foot. His bride-elect is Grace Armstrong

Mrs Elihot, Hobbie's grandmother
John and Harry, Hobbie's brothers
Lilas, Jean, and Arnot, Hobbie's sisters—Sir W Scott, The Black Dwarf (time, Anne)

Elmo (St) The fire of St Elmo (Feu de Saint Elme), a corposant. If only one appears on a ship-mast, foul weather is at hand, but if two or more, they indicate that stormy weather is about to cease. By the Italians these comazants are called the "fires of St Peter and St Nicholas." In Latin the single fire is called "Helen," but the two "Castor and Pollux." Horace says (Odes, I. xii. 27)

Quorum simul alba nautis stella refulsit
Desult saxis agitatae humor
Concidunt venti fugiuntque nubes, etc

But Longfellow makes the stella indicative of foul weather

Last night I saw St. Elmo's stars

(St Elmo is the patron saint of sailors)

Elo'a, the first of seraphs. His name with God is "The Chosen One," but the angels call him Eloa. Eloi and Gabriel were angel friends.

Eloa, fairest spirit of heaven. His thoughts are past understanding to the mind of man. His looks more lovely than the day spring more beaming than the stars of heaven when they first flew into being at the voice of the Creator.—Klopstock The Messiah l. (1748)

Eloi (St.), that is, St. Louis. The kings of France were called Loys up to the time of Louis XIII. Probably the "delicate oath" of Chaucer's prioress, who was a French scholar "after the scole of Stratford-atte-Bowe," was St. Loys, i.e. St. Louis, and not St. Eloi the patron saint of smiths and artists. St. Floi was bishop of Noyon in the reign of Dagobert, and a noted craftsman in gold and silver (Query, "Saint Eloy" for Sainte Loys?).

El'ops. There was a fish so called, but Milton uses the word (Paradise Lost, v. 525) for the dumb serpent or serpent which gives no warning of its approach by hissing or otherwise (Greek, ellops, "mute or dumb").

Eloquence (The Four Monarchs of) (1) Demosthenes, the Greek orator (B.C. 385-322), (2) Cicero, the Roman orator (B.C. 106-43), (3) Sadi, the Persian (1184-1263), (4) Zoroaster (B.C. 589-513).

Eloquent (That Old Man), Isocrates, the Greek orator. When he heard that the battle of Cheronea was lost, and that Greece was no longer free, he died of grief.

That dishonest victory
At Cheronea fatal to liberty
Killed with report that Old Man Eloquent.
Milton, Sonnet ix

(This victory was gained by Philip of Macedonia. Called "dishonest" because bribery and corruption were employed.)

Eloquent Doctor (The), Peter Aureolus, archbishop of Aix (fourteenth century).

Elp'rus, Hope personified. He was "clad in sky-like blue," and the motto of his shield was "I hold by being held." He went attended by Pollic'ita (promise). Fully described in canto ix (Greek, elpis, "hope")—Phineas Fletcher, The Purple Island (1633).

Elshender the Recluse, called "The Cann' Elshie" or the "Wise Wight of Muckleston Moor." This is "the black dwarf," or Sir Edward Mauley, the hero of the novel—Sir W. Scott, The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Elsie, the daughter of Gotthelb, a cottage farmer of Bavaria. Prince Henry of Hohenek, being struck with leprosy, was told he would never be cured till a maiden chaste and spotless offered to give her life in sacrifice for him. Elsie volunteered to die for the prince, and he accompanied her to Salerno, but either the exercise, the excitement, or some charm, no matter what, had quite cured the prince, and when he entered the cathedral with Elsie, it was to make her lady Alicia, his bride.—Hartmann von der Aue, Poor Henry (twelfth century), Longfellow, Golden Legend.

Alkestis, daughter of Pelias and wife of Admetos, died instead of her husband, but was brought back by Hercules from the shades below, and restored to her husband.

Elspeth (Auld), the old servant of Dandie Dinmont the store-farmer at Charlie's Hope—Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Elspeth (Old) of the Craighurnfoot, the mother of Saunders Mucklebacket (the old fisherman at Musselcrug), and formerly servant to the countess of Glenallan—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Elvino, a wealthy farmer, in love with Am'na the somnambulist. Am'na being found in the bedroom of conte Rodolfo the day before her wedding, induces Elvino to break off the match and promise marriage to Lisa, but as the truth of the matter breaks in upon him, and he is convinced of Am'na's innocence, he turns over Lisa to Alessio, her paramour, and marries Aminta, his first and only love — Bellini's opera, La Sonnambula (1831)

Elvira, sister of don Duarte, and niece of the governor of Lisbon. She marries Clodio, the cockcomb son of don Antonio — C. Cibber, Love Makes a Man

Elvira, the young wife of Gomez, a rich old banker. She carries on a liaison with colonel Lorenzo, by the aid of her father-confessor Dominick, but is always checkmated, and it turns out that Lorenzo is her brother — Dryden, The Spanish Fiyar (1680)

Elvira, a noble lady, who gives up everything to become the mistress of Pizarro. She tries to soften his rude and cruel nature, and to lead him into more generous ways. Her love being changed to hate, she engages Rolla to slay Pizarro in his tent, but the noble Peruvian spares his enemy, and makes him a friend. Ultimately, Pizarro is slain in fight with Alonzo, and Elvira retires to a convent — Sheridan, Pizarro (altered from Kotzebue, 1799)

Elvira (Donna), a lady deceived by don Giovanni, who basely deluded her into an amour with his valet Leporello — Mozart's opera, Don Giovanni (1787)

Elvira "the puritan," daughter of lord Walton, betrothed to Arturo (lord Arthur Talbot), a cavalier. On the day of espousals the young man aids Enrichetta (Henrietta, widow of Charles I) to escape, and Elvira, thinking he has eloped with a rival, temporarily loses her reason. Cromwell's soldiers arrest Arturo for treason, but he is subsequently pardoned, and marries Elvira — Bellini's opera, I Puritani (1834)

Elvira, a lady in love with Ernani the robber-captain and head of a league against don Carlos (afterwards Charles V of Spain). Ernani was just on the point of marrying Elvira, when he was summoned to death by Gomez de Silva, and stabbed himself — Verdi, Ernani (an opera, 1841)

Elvira, betrothed to Alfonso (son of the duke d'Areos). No sooner is the marriage completed than she learns that Alfonso has seduced Fenella, a dumb girl, sister of Masaniello the usherman. Masaniello, to revenge his wrongs, heads an insurrection, and Alfonso with Elvira run for safety to the fisherman's hut, where they find Fenella, who promises to protect them. Masaniello, being made chief magistrate of Portici, is killed by the mob, Fenella throws herself into the crater of Vesuvius, and Alfonso is left to live in peace with Elvira — Auber, Masaniello (1831)

Elvire (2 syl), the wife of don Juan, whom he abandons. She enters a convent, and tries to reclaim her profligate husband, but without success — Moliere, Don Juan (1665)

Ely (Bishop of), introduced by sir W. Scott in the Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Elysium (the Elysian fields), the land of the blest, to which the favoured of the gods passed without dying. They lie in one of the "Fortunate Islands" (Canaries)

Fancy dreams
Of sacred fountains and Elysian groves,
And vales of bliss.
Aken-side Pleasures of Imagination i. (1744)

Emathian Conqueror (The Great), Alexander the Great. Emathia is Macedonia and Thessaly. Emathion, a son of Titan and Aurora, reigned in Macedonia. Pliny tells us that Alexander, when he besieged Thebes, spared the house in which Pindar the poet was born, out of reverence to his great abilities.

Liſt not thy spear against the Ma.æ's bower
The great Emathian conqueror bld spare
The house of Pindarus, when temple and tower
Went to the ground.

Milton Sonnet viii.

Embla, the woman Eve of Scandinavian mythology. Eve or Embla was made of elm, but Ash or Adam was made of ash.

Em'elie or EMELYE, sister-in-law of duke Theseus (2 syl), beloved by both Palamon and Ar'eyte (2 syl), but the former had her to wife.

Emelie that fairer was to scene
Than is the lillie on hildes stalkes grene
And frescher than the May with floures newe.
Chaucer Canterbury Tales ('The Knight's Tale' 1389)

Emerald Isle (The), Ireland, so called first by Dr W. Drennan, in his poem entitled Erin (1754-1820)

Emeral'der, an Irishman, a native of the Emerald Isle.

Emer'ita (St), sister of King Lucius, who, when her brother abdicated the British crown, accompanied him to Switzerland, and shared with him there a martyr's death.

Emerita the next, King Lucius sister dear
Who in Helvetia with her martyr brother died.
Dryden Polyolbion xxiv (1692)

Emile (2 syl.), the chief character of a philosophical romance on education by

Jean Jacques Rousseau (1762) Emile is the author's ideal of a young man perfectly educated, every bias but that of nature having been carefully withheld

N B—Emile is the French form of Emilius

His body is insured to fatigue as Rousseau advises in his Emilius—Continuation of the Arabian Nights iv 69

Emile (The Divine) of Voltaire Mde Châtelet, with whom he lived at Cirey

Emilia, wife of Iago the ancient of Othello in the Venetian army She is induced by Iago to purloin a certain handkerchief given by Othello to Desdemona Iago then prevails on Othello to ask his wife to show him the handkerchief, but she cannot find it, and Iago tells the Moor she has given it to Cassio as a love-token At the death of Desdemona, Emilia (who till then never suspected the real state of the case) reveals the truth of the matter, and Iago rushes on her and kills her—Shakespeare, Othello (1611)

The virtue of Emilia is such as we often find worn loosely but not cast off easy to commit small crimes, but quickened and alarmed at atrocious villainies.—Dr Johnson.

Emilia Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale Also the lady-love of Peregrine Pickle, in Smollett, The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle

Emily, the fiancée of colonel Tamper Duty called away the colonel to Havanah, and on his return he pretended to have lost one eye and one leg in the war, in order to see if Emily would love him still Emily was greatly shocked, and Mr Prattle the medical practitioner was sent for Amongst other gossip, Mr Prattle told his patient he had seen the colonel, who looked remarkably well, and most certainly was maimed neither in his legs nor in his eyes Emily now saw through the trick, and resolved to turn the tables on the colonel For this end she induced Mlle Florival to appear en militaire, under the assumed name of captain Johnson, and to make desperate love to her When the colonel had been thoroughly roasted and was about to quit the house for ever, his friend major Belford entered and recognized Mlle as his fiancée, the trick was discovered, and all ended happily—G Colman, sen, The Deuce is in Him (1762)

Emir or Ameer, a title given to lieutenants of provinces and other officers of the sultan, and occasionally assumed by the sultan himself The sultan is not unfrequently called "The Great Ameer," and the Ottoman empire is sometimes spoken of as "the country of the Great Ameer" What Matthew Paris and other monks call "ammirals" is the same word Milton speaks of the "mast of some tall ammiral" (Paradise Lost, i 294)

The difference between xariff or sariff and amir is this the former is given to the blood successors of Mahomet, and the latter to those who maintain his religious faith—Selden, Titles of Honour, ii 73-4 (1672)

Em'ly (Little), daughter of Tom, the brother-in-law of Dan'el Peggotty a Yarmouth fisherman, by whom the orphan child was brought up While engaged to Ham Peggotty (Dan'el's nephew), Little Em'ly runs away with Steerforth, a handsome but unprincipled gentleman Being subsequently reclaimed, she emigrates to Australia with Dan'el Peggotty and old Mrs Gummidge—C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

and Fletcher, The Humorous Lieutenant (1647)

Encel'ados (Longfellow, Encel'ados), the most powerful of all the giants who conspired against Jupiter. He was struck with a thunder-bolt, and covered with the heap of earth now called mount Etna. The smoke of the volcano is the breath of the burned giant, and when he shifts his side it is an earthquake.

Fama est, Enceladum semulatum fulmine corpus Urgeri mole hac, ingentemque insuper Etiam
Impositam, ruptis flammam explare caminis
Et, fessam quoties mutat latus, intremere onnem
Murmure Trinacriam, et coelum sub exere fumo
Virgil, Æneid, III 578-582

Where the burning clinders, blown
From the lips of the earth-born
Enceladus, fill the air

Longfellow Enceladus

En'crates (3 syl), Temperance personified, the husband of Agneta (wisely chastity). When his wife's sister Parthenia (maidenly chastity) was wounded in the battle of Mansoul, by False Delight, he and his wife ran to her assistance, and soon routed the foes who were hounding her. Continence (her lover) went also, and poured a balm into her wounds, which healed them (Greek, ἐγκράτης, "continent, temperate").

To have I often seen a purple flower
Tainting thro' heat hang down her drooping head,
But, soon refreshed with a welcome shower
Began again her lively beauties spread
And with new pride her silken leaves display
Phineas Fletcher The Purple Island xi (1633)

Endell (Martha), a poor fallen girl, to whom Em'ly goes when Steerforth deserts her. She emigrates with Dan'el Peggotty, and marries a young farmer in Australia.—C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

Endless, the rascally lawyer in No Song No Supper, by P Hoare (1754-1834)

Endymion, a noted astronomer who, from mount Latmus, in Caria, discovered the course of the moon. Hence it is fabled that the moon sleeps with Endymion. Strictly speaking, Endymion is the setting sun.

So Latmus by the wise Endymion is renowned,
That hill on whose high top he was the first that found
Pale Phæbus wandering course, so skilful in her sphere
As some stick not to say that he enjoyed her there
Dryden Coislinion, VI (1612)

To sleep like Endymion, to sleep long and soundly. Endymion requested of Jove permission to sleep as long as he felt inclined. Hence the proverb, Endymionis somnum dormire. Jean Ogier de Gombaud wrote in French a romance or prose poem called Endymion (1621), and one of the best paintings of A L Girodet is "Endymion." Cowley, referring to Gombaud's romance, says

While there is a people or a sun
Endymion's story with the moon shall run

John Keats, in 1818, published his Endymion (a poetic romance), and the criticism of the Quarterly Review is said to have caused his death. Lord Beaconsfield's novel (1880)

Endymion. So Wm Browne calls sir Walter Raleigh, who was for a time in disgrace with queen Elizabeth, whom he calls "Cyn'thia."

Enguerraud, brother of the marquis of Montserrat, a crusader.—Sir W. Scott, The Talsman (time, Richard I)

En'id, the personification of spotless purity. She was the daughter of En'iol, and wife of Geraint. The tale of Geraint and En'id allegorizes the contagion of distrust and jealousy, commencing with Guinever's infidelity, and spreading downwards among the Arthurian knights. In order to save Enid from this taint, sir Geraint removed from the court to Devon, but overhearing part of a sentence uttered by Enid, he fancied that she was unfaithful and treated her for a time with great harshness. In an illness, Enid nursed Geraint with such wifely devotion that he felt convinced of his error. A perfect reconciliation took place, and they "crowned a happy life with a fair death"—Tennyson, Idylls of the King ("Geraint and Enid")

Enna, a city of Sicily, remarkable for its beautiful plains, fruitful soil, and numerous springs. Proserpine was carried off by Pluto while gathering flowers in the adjacent meadow.

She moved

Ephe'sian, a toper, a dissolute sot, a jovial companion. When Page (2 Henry II act ii sc 2) tells prince Henry that a company of men were about to sup with Falstaff, in Eastcheap, and calls them "Ephesians," he probably meant soldiers called fethas ("foot-soldiers"), and hence toppers. Malone suggests that the word is a pun on phese ("to chastise or pay one tit for tat"), and means "quarrelsome fellows"

Epic Poetry (The Father of), Homer (about 950 B C)

Ep'icene (3 syl) or The Silent Woman, one of the three great comedies of Ben Jonson (1609)

The other two are Volpone (2 syl, 1605), and The Alchemist (1610)

Epicurus The amé de cœur of this philosopher was Leontium (See LOVERS)

Epicurus of China, Tao-tse, who commenced the search for "the elixir of perpetual youth and health" (B C 510)

* * Thomas Moore has a prose romance entitled The Epicurean. Lucretius the Roman poet, in his De Rerum Natura, is an exponent of the Epicurean doctrines

Epidaurus (That God in), Asclepius, son of Apollo, who was worshipped in Epidaurus, a city of Peloponnesus. Being sent for to Rome during a plague, he assumed the form of a serpent—Latin Nat Hist, vi, Ovid, Metaph, vi

Never since of serpent kind serpents because they happened to kill one belonging to Mars)

Ephialtes (4 syl), one of the giants who made war upon the gods. He was deprived of his left eye by Apollo, and of his right eye by Hercules.

Epigoni, seven youthful warriors, sons of the seven chiefs who laid siege to Thebes. All the seven chiefs (except Adrastus) perished in the siege, but the seven sons, ten years later, took the city and razed it to the ground. The chiefs and sons were (1) Adrastus, whose son was Ægialeus (4 syl), (2) Polynikēs, whose son was Thersander, (3) Amphiaraios (5 syl), whose son was Alkmeon (the chief), (4) Tydeus (2 syl), whose son was Diomedēs, (5) Kapaneus (3 syl), whose son was Sthenelos, (6) Parthenopaios, whose son was Promachos, (7) Mekisteus (3 syl), whose son was Iuryalos.

Æschylus has a tragedy on The Seven Chiefs against Thebes. There are also two epics, one The Thebaid of Statius, and The Epigoni sometimes attributed to Homer and sometimes to one of the Cyclic poets of Greece.

Epigoniad (The), called "the Scotch Iliad," by William Wilkie (1721-1772). This is the tale of the Epigoni or seven sons of the seven chieftains who laid siege to Thebes. The tale is this: When Oedipus abdicated, his two sons agreed to reign alternate years, but at the expiration of the first year, the elder son (Eteocles) refused to give up the throne. Whereupon the younger brother (Polynikēs) interested six Grecian chiefs to espouse his cause, and the allied armies laid siege to Thebes, without success. Subsequently, the seven sons of the old chiefs went against the city to avenge the deaths of their fathers, who had fallen in the former siege. They succeeded in taking the city, and in placing Thersander on the throne. For the names of the sons, see above, EPIGONI. The hero of the Epigoniad is Diomed, and the heroine Cassandra.

Epimenides (5 syl) of Crete, sometimes reckoned one of the "seven wise men of Greece" in the place of Periander. He slept for fifty-seven years in a cave, and, on waking, found everything so changed that he could recognize nothing. Epimenides lived 289 years, and was adored by the Cretans as one of their "Curiatēs" or priests of Jove. He was contemporary with Solon.

(Goethe has a poem called Des Epimenides Erwachen—See Heinrich's Epimenides.)

Epimenides's Drug. A nymph who loved Epimenides gave him a draught in a bull's horn, one single drop of which would not only cure any ailment, but would also serve for a hearty meal.

Le Nouveau Epimenide is a man who lives in a dream in a kind of "Castle of Spain," where he deems himself a king, and does not wish to be disillusioned. The song is by Jacinthe Leclerc, one of the members of the "Société de Momus" of Paris.

Epinogris (Sir), son of the king of Northumberland. He loved an earl's daughter, but slew the earl in a knightly combat. Next day, a knight challenged him to fight, and the lady was to be the prize of the victor. Sir Epinogris, being overthrown, lost the lady, but when sir Palomides heard the tale, he promised to recover her. Accordingly, he challenged the victorious knight, who turned out to be his brother. The point of dispute was then amicably arranged by giving up the lady to sir Epinogris.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, ii. 169 (1470).

Eppie, one of the servants of the Rev Josiah Cargill. In the same novel is Eppie Anderson, one of the servants at the Mowbray Arms, Old St. Ronan's, held by Meg Dods.—Sir W. Scott, St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Epps, cook of Saunders Fairford a lawyer.—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Equity (Father of), Heneage Finch, earl of Nottingham (1621-1682). In Absalom and Achitophel (by Dryden and Tate) he is called "Amri."

Sincere was Amri, and not only knew,
But Israel's sanctions into practice drew
Our laws, that did a boundless ocean deem.
Were coasted all, and fathomed all by him
To him the doub't blessing doth belong,
With Moses' inspiration, Aaron's tongue
Absalom and Achitophel ll. (1632).

1 HEVRY IV was told that "he should not die but in Jerusalem," which he supposed meant the Holy Land, but he died in the Jerusalem Chamber, London, which is the chapter-house of Westminster Abbey.

2 POPE SILVESTER was also told he should die at Jerusalem, and he died while saying mass in a church so called at Rome.

8 CAMBISIES, son of Cyrus, was told that he should die in Ecbatana, which he supposed meant the capital of Media. Being wounded accidentally in Syria, he asked the name of the place, and being told it was Ecbatana, he replied, "Here, then, I am destined to end my life."

4 A Messenian seer, being sent to consult the Delphic oracle respecting the issue of the Messenian war, then raging, received for reply

When the goat stoops to drink of the Neda, O seer
From Messenia flee, for its ruin is near!

In order to avert this calamity, all goats were diligently chased from the banks of the Neda. One day, Theoclos observed a fig tree growing on the river-side, and its branches dipped into the stream. The interpretation of the oracle flashed across his mind, for he remembered that goat and fig tree, in the Messenian dialect, were the same word.

* * The pun would be clearer to an English reader if "a stork" were substituted for the goat. "When a stork stoops to drink of the Neda," and the "stalk" of the fig tree dipping into the stream.

5 When the allied Greeks demanded of the Delphic oracle what would be the issue of the battle of Salamis, they received for answer

Seed time and harvest, weeping fires shall tell How thousands fought at Salamis and fell but whether the oracle referred to the Greeks or Persians who were to fall by "thousands," was not stated.

6 When Cræsus demanded what would be the issue of the battle against the Persians, headed by Cyrus, the answer was, he "should behold a mighty empire overthrown," but whether that empire was his own, or that of Cyrus, only the actual issue of the fight could determine.

7 Similarly, when PHILIP of Macedon sent to Delphi to inquire if his Persian expedition would prove successful, he received for reply, "The ready victim turned for sacrifice stands before the Ho." Philip took it for granted that (2 Syready victim) was the king of

11 A wizard told king Edward IV that "after him should reign one the first letter of whose name should be G." The king thought the person meant was his brother George, but the duke of Gloucester was the person pointed at.—Holmes, Chronicles, Shakespeare, Richard III act 1 sc 1

Erachius (The emperor) condemned a knight to death on the supposition of murder, but the man supposed to be murdered making his appearance, the condemned man was taken back, under the expectation that he would be instantly acquitted. But no, Erachius ordered all three to be put to death the knight, because the emperor had ordered it, the man who brought him back, because he had not carried out the emperor's order, and the man supposed to be murdered, because he was virtually the cause of death to the other two.

This tale is told in the Gesta Romanorum, and Chaucer has put it into the mouth of his sumpnor. It is also told by Seneca, in his De Ira, but he ascribes it to Cornelius Piso, and not to Erachius.

Éraste (2 syl), hero of Les Facheux, by Molière. He is in love with Orphise (2 syl), whose tutor is Damis (1661).

Er'celdoun (Thomas of), also called "Thomas the Rhymer," introduced by sir W. Scott in his novel called Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I).

It is said that Thomas of Er'celdoun is no dead but that he is sleeping beneath the Eldon Hills, in Scotland. One day he met with a lady of elfin race beneath the Eldon tree, and she led him to an underground region, where he remained for seven years. He then revisited the earth, but bound himself to return when summoned. One day when he was making merry with his friends, he was told that a hart and blind were parading the street and he knew it was his summons, so he immediately went to the Eldon tree and has never since been heard of.—Sir W. Scott, Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

Ereck, a knight of the Round Table. He marries the beautiful Enite (2 syl), daughter of a poor knight, and falls into a state of idleness and effeminacy, till Enite rouses him to action. He then goes forth on an expedition of adventures, and after combating with brigands, giants, and dwarfs, returns to the court of king Arthur, where he remains till the death of his father. He then enters on his inheritance, and lives peaceably the rest of his life.—Hartmann von der Aue, Ereck (thirteenth century)

Ereen'ia (3 syl), a glendoveer' or good spirit, the beloved son of Cas'apa (8 syl), father of the immortals. Ereenia took pity on Kail'yal (2 syl), daughter of Ladur'lad, and carried her to his Bower of Bliss in paradise (canto vii). Here Kail'yal could not stay, because she was still a living daughter of earth. On her return to earth, she was chosen for the bride of Jagan-naut, and Ar'alana came to dishonour her, but she set fire to the pagoda, and Ereenia came to her rescue. Ereenia was set upon by the witch Lor'mite (3 syl), and carried to the submerged city of Bal, whence he was delivered by Ladur'lad. The glendoveer now craved Seeva for vengeance, but the god sent him to Yamen (i.e. Pluto), and Yamen said the measure of iniquity was now full, so Ar'alana and his father Kehama were both made inmates of the city of everlasting woe, while Ereenia earned Kail'yal, who had quaffed the waters of immortality, to his Bower of Bliss, to dwell with him in everlasting joy.—Southey, Curse of Kehama (1809)

Eret'rian Bull (The) Menedo mos of Eret'ria, in Euboea, was called "Bull" from the bull-like breadth and gravity of his face. He founded the Eret'rian school (fourth century B.C.)

Eric, "Windy-cap," king of Sweden. He could make the wind blow from any quarter by simply turning his cap. Hence arose the expression, "a capful of wind."

Eril'yab (3 syl), the widowed and deposed queen of the Horem (2 syl), an Indian tribe settled on a south branch of the Missouri. Her husband was king Tepoll'loni, and her son Amal'alita Madoc, when he reached America, espoused her cause, and succeeded in restoring her to her throne and empire.—Southey, Madoc (1805)

Erin, from car or iar ("west") and in ("island"), the Western Island, Ireland.

Eriphy'le (4 syl), the wife of Amphiar'os. Being bribed by a golden necklace, she betrayed to Poly'ni'ces where her husband had concealed himself, that he might not go to the siege of Thebes, where he knew that he should be killed. Congreve calls the word Eriphy'le.

Erysich'thon (should be Erysichthon), a Thessalian, whose appetite was insatiable. Having spent all his estate in the purchase of food, nothing was left but his daughter Metra, and her he sold to buy food for his voracious appetite, but Metra had the power of transforming herself into any shape she chose, so as often as her father sold her, she changed her form and returned to him. After a time, Iphisithon was reduced to feed upon himself—Ovid, Metaph., viii 2 (740 to end) An allegory of Death

Drayton says when the Wye saw her goodly oak trees sold for firewood, she bethought her of Iphisithon's end, who, "when nor sea, nor land, sufficient were," ate his own flesh—Polyolbion, vii

So Iphisithon once fired (as men say)
Yet I cannot find a poet who has said

Er'meline (Dame), the wife of Reynard, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498)

Ermin'ia, the heroine of Jerusalem Delivered. She fell in love with Tancred, and when the Christian army besieged Jerusalem, arrayed herself in Clorinda's armour to go to him. After certain adventures, she found him wounded, and nursed him tenderly, but the poet has not told us what was the ultimate lot of this fair Syrian—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

Ernani, the robber-captain, duke of Segorbia and Cardoña, lord of Aragón, and count of Ernani. He is in love with Elvira, the betrothed of don Ruy Gomez de Silva, an old Spanish grandee, whom she detests. Charles V falls in love with her, and Ruy Gomez joins Ernani in a league against their common rival. During this league Ernani gives Ruy Gomez a horn, saying, "Sound but this horn, and at that moment Ernani will cease to live." Just as he is about to espouse Elvira, the horn is sounded, and Ernani stabs himself—Verdi, Ernani (an opera, 1841).

Ernest (Duke) son-in-law of Kaiser Konrad II. He murders his feudal lord, and goes on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, to expiate his crime. The poem so called is a mixture of Homeric legends, Oriental myths, and pilgrims' tales. We have pygmies and evelopes, geni and enchanter, fairies and dwarfs, monks and devotees. After a world of hair-breadth escapes, the duke reaches the Holy Sepulchre, pays his vows, returns to Germany, and is pardoned—Henry von Veldig (minnesinger), Duke Ernest (twelfth century)

Ernest de Fridberg, "the prisoner of State." He was imprisoned in the dungeon of the Giant's Mount fortress for fifteen years on a false charge of treason. Ulrica (his natural daughter by the countess Marie), dressed in the clothes of Herman, the deaf and dumb jailer-boy, gets access to the dungeon and contrives his escape, but he is retaken, and led back to the dungeon. Being subsequently set at liberty, he marries the countess Marie (the mother of Ulrica)—E. Stirling, The Prisoner of State (1817)

Eros, the manumitted slave of Antony. The triumph Antony made Eros swear that he would kill him if commanded by him so to do. When in Egypt, Antony (after the battle of Actium), fearing lest he should fall into the hands of Octavius Cæsar, ordered Eros to keep his promise. Eros drew his sword, but thrust it into his own side, and fell dead at the feet of Antony. "O noble Eros," cried Antony, "I thank thee for teaching me how to die!"—Plutarch

(Eros is the Greek name of Cupid, and hence amorous poetry is called Erotic)

Erostratos (in Latin Erostratus), the incendiary who set fire to the temple of Diana of Ephesus, that his name might be perpetuated. An edict was published, prohibiting any mention of the name, but the edict was wholly ineffective

* * Charles V, wishing to be shown over the Pantheon [All Saints] of Rome, was taken to the top by a Roman knight. At parting, the knight told the emperor that he felt an almost irresistible desire to push his majesty down from the top of the building, "in order to immortalize

Error, a monster who lived in a den in "Wandering Wood," and with whom the Red Cross Knight had his first adventure. She had a brood of 1000 young ones of sundry shapes, and these cubs crept into their mother's mouth when alarmed, as young kangaroos creep into their mother's pouch. The knight was nearly killed by the stench which issued from the foul fiend, but he succeeded in "rifling" her head off, whereupon the brood lapped up the blood, and burst with satiety

Or dare to draw his curtain

Britannia's Pastorals ii. 2.

This curtain was not drawn by Apelles, but by Parrhasios, who lived a full century before Apelles. The contest was between Zeuxis and Parrhasios. The former exhibited a bunch of grapes which deceived the birds, and the latter a curtain which deceived the competitor.

BRUSSELL (E con) says "According to Homer, Achilles had a vulnerable heel." It is a vulgar error to attribute this myth to Homer. The blind old bard nowhere says a word about it. The story of dipping Achilles in the river Styx is altogether post-Homeric.

BYRON Acæzes' Ships Byron says that Acæzes looked on his "ships by thousands" off the coast of Salamis. The entire number of sails was 1200, of these 400 were wrecked before the battle off the coast of Scyros, so that even supposing the whole of the rest were engaged, the number could not exceed 800.—Isles of Greece

The Isle Teos In the same poem he refers to "Teos" as one of the isles of Greece, but Teos is a maritime town on the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor.

CERVANTES Dorothea's Father Dorothea represents herself as queen of Miconeon, because both her father and mother were dead, but don Quixote speaks of him to her as alive.—Pt I iv 8

Mambrino's Helmet In pt I iii 8 we are told that the galley-slaves set free by don Quixote assaulted him with stones, and "snatching the basin from his head, broke it to pieces." In bk iv 15 we find this basin quite whole and sound, the subject of a judicial inquiry, the question being whether it was a helmet or a barber's basin. Sancho (ch 11) says, he "picked it up, bruised and battered, intending to get it mended," but he says, "I broke it to pieces," or, according to one translator, "broke it into a thou-and pieces." In bk iv 8 we are told that don Quixote "came from his chamber armed cap-a-pie, with the barber's basin on his head."

Sancho's Ass We are told (pt I iii 9) that Gines de Passamonte "stole Sancho's ass." Sancho laments the loss with true pathos, and the knight condoles with him. But soon afterwards Cervantes says "He [Sancho] jogged on leisurely upon his ass after his master."

Sancho's Great-coat Sancho Panza, we are told, left his wallet behind in the Crescent Moon tavern, where he was tossed in a blanket, and put the provisions left by the priests in his great-coat (ch 5). The galley-slaves robbed him of "his great-coat, leaving only his doublet" (ch 8), but in the next chapter (9) we find "the victuals had not been touched," though the rascals "searched diligently for booty." Now, if the food was in the great-coat, and the great-coat was stolen, how is it that the victuals remained in Sancho's possession untouched?

Sancho's Wallet We are told that Sancho left his wallet by mistake at the tavern where he was blanket-tossed (ch 5), but in ch 9, when he found the portmanteau, "he crammed the gold and linen into his wallet."—Pt I iii

To make these oversights more striking, the author says, when Sancho found the portmanteau, "he entirely forgot the loss of his wallet, his great-coat, and of his faithful companion and servant Dapple" (the ass).

Supper Cervantes makes the party at the Crescent tavern eat two suppers in one evening. In ch 5 the curate orders in supper, and "after supper" they read the story of Fatal Curiosity. In ch 12 we are told "the cloth was laid [again] for supper," and the company sat down to it, quite forgetting that they had already supped.—Pt I iv

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPEDIA states that "the fame of Beaumarchais rests on his two operas, Le Barbier de Seville (1755) and Le Mariage de Figaro." Every one knows that Mozart composed the opera of Figaro (1786), and that Casti wrote the libretto. The opera of Le Barbier de Seville, or rather Il Barbiere di Siviglia, was composed by Rossini, in 1816. What Beaumarchais wrote was two comedies, one in four acts and the other in five acts.—Art "Beaumarchais."

CHAMBERS'S JOURNAL We are told, in a paper entitled "Coincidences," that "Thursday has proved a fatal day with the Tudors, for on that day died Henry VIII., Edward VI., queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth." This is not correct in regard to Henry VIII., who died January 28, 1546-7, according to the best authority, Rymer's Ædæra, vol xv, and that day was a Friday (Old Style), and not a Saturday.

In the same paper we are told that Saturday has been fatal to the present dynasty, "for William IV and every one of the Georges died on a Saturday." This is not correct in regard to George I., who died Sunday, June 11, 1727, and William IV., who died Tuesday, June 20, 1837. The other three Georges died on a Saturday, viz. George II.,

October 25, 1760, George III, January 29, 1820, and George IV, June 26, 1830

COLEMAN. Job Thornberry was to Peregrine, who offers to assist him in his difficulties, "Dearest, young man, in time." But Peregrine was at least 45 years old when so addressed. He was 15 when Job first knew him, and had been at least thirty years in Calcutta. Job Thornberry, then, was not above five or six years older Courts calls the rose "the glory of April and May," but June is the great rose month. In the south of England they begin to bloom in the latter half of May, and go on to the middle of July. April roses would be horticultural curiosities.

Critics at fault. The licentiate tells don Quixote that some critics found fault with him for defective memory, and instanced it in this "We are told that Sancho's ass is stolen, but the author has forgotten to mention who the thief was." This is not the case, as we are distinctly informed that it was stolen by Gines de Pasamonte, one of the galley-slaves — Don Quixote, II : 3

DICKENS, in Edwin Drood, puts "rooks and rooks nests" (instead of daws) "in the towers of Cloisterham."

In Nicholas Nickleby he represents Mr Squeers as setting his boys "to hoe turnips" in midwinter.

In The Tale of Two Cities, in 1, he says "The name of the strong man of Old Scripture descended to the chief functionary who worked the guillotine." But the name of this functionary was Sargons, not Samson.

Garr says that man has seven bones in the sternum (instead of three), and Sylvius, in reply to Vesalius, contends that "in days of yore the robust chests of heroes had more bones than men now have."

GIORR (Robert) speaks of Delphos as an island but Delphos, or rather Delphi, was a city of Phocis, and no island. "Six noblemen were sent to the isle of Delphos"—Darius and 1, 1, 1. Probably he confounded the cit. of Delphi with the isle of Delos.

But Tuxer, in his Archaeo-Diography, says "Crouchmas means Christmas," and adds that Tuxer is his authority. But this is altogether a mistake. Tuxer, in his "May Remembrances," says "I from bull corn fact, tell Crouchmas be past ie St Helen's Day. Tuxer evidently means from May 3 (the invention of the Cross) to August 18 (St. Helena Day or the Cross-mass), not Christmas."

JOHNSON (Dr) makes Addison speak of Steele as "little Dick," whereas the person so called by Addison was a dyed-in-the-wool actor who played "Goliath" in Dryden's Spanish Fryar. He debauched "Pastern, the knee of a horse"—Dictionary

London News (A), one of the leading journals of the day, has spelt out three times within two years of "Jassing under the Caudire lurl," evidently supposing them to be a "yoke" instead of a valley or mountain pass.

Lowmison calls Ing'ena a "Celtic-man," whereas the very word means an Irishman.

Wm. Ina La in 17 Ma^t Scott & Co

Without doubt, the poet ⁶⁻¹⁰⁻¹¹⁻¹² mistook John

Duns [Scottus], who died in 1308, for John Scottus [Frigena], who died in 875. Frigena translated into Latin St Dionysius. He was latitudinarian in his views, and anything but "a Scottish beast" or Calvinist.

The Two Angels Longfellow crowns the death-angel with amaranth, with which Milton says, "the spirits elect bind their resplendent locks," and his angel of life he crowns with asphodels, the flowers of Pluto or the grave.

MEVILLE (Whyte) makes a very prominent part of his story called Holnby House turn on the death of a favourite hawk named Diamond, which Mary Cave tossed off, and saw "fall lifeless at the king's feet" (ch. xiv). In ch. xli this very hawk is represented to be alive, "proud, beautiful, and cruel, like a Venus Victrix it perched on her mistress's wrist, unhooded."

MILTON Colkitto and Macdonnell. In Sonnet x Milton speaks of Colkitto and M'Donnel as two distinct families, but they are really one and the same. The M'Donnells of Antrim were called Colkittob because they were descended from the lame Colin.

In Comus (ver. 880) he makes the siren Ligea "sleek her hair with a golden comb," as if she were a Scandinavian mermaid.

MOORE (Thom) says

The sunflower turns on her god, when he etc.
The same look which she turned when he rose Irish Melodies ii (Believe Me if all those Endearing Young Chorus)

The sunflower does not turn either to the rising or setting sun. It receives its name solely because it resembles a picture sun. It is not a turn-sun or heliotropo at all.

MORRIS says

She the saffron gown will never wear
And in no flower strewn couch shall she be laid she will never be a bride Milton also, in L'Allegro, says

There let Hymen oft appear
In saffron robe.

Brides wore a white robe but croen-coloured veil "Lutea demissos clarunt flammea vultus"—Lucan ii. 361 See also Pliny, Natural History, xxi. 22.

MURPHY, in the Grecian Daughter, says (act i. 1)

Have you forgot the elder Dionysius,
Surmamed the Tyrant? Evander came from Greece,
And sent the tyrant to his humble rank.

Once more reduced to roam for vile subsistence, wandering sophist thro' the realms of Greece.

was not Dionysius the Elder, but Dionysius the Younger, who was the "wandering sophist," and it was not Evander, but Timoleon, who dethroned him. The elder Dionysius was not dethroned at all, nor ever reduced "to humble rank." He reigned thirty-eight years without interruption, and died a king, in the plenitude of his glory, at the age of 63.

In the same play (act iv. 1) Euphrasius says to Dionysius the Younger Think of thy father's fate at Corinth, Dionysias.

It was not the father but the son (Dionysius the Younger) who lived in exile at Corinth.

In the same play he makes Timoleon victorious over the Syracusians (that is historically correct), and he makes Euphrasius stab Dionysius the Younger, whereas he retreated to Corinth, and spent his time in debauchery, but supported himself by keeping a school. Of his death nothing is known, but certainly he was not stabbed to death by Euphrasius.—See Plutarch.

RYMER, in his Fædæra, ascribes to Henry I (who died in 1135) a preaching expedition for the restoration of Rochester Church, injured by fire in 1177 (vol. I. i. 9).

In the previous page Rymer ascribes to Henry I a deed of gift from "Henry king of England and lord of Ireland," but every one knows that Ireland was conquered by Henry II, and the deed referred to was the act of Henry III.

On p. 71 of the same vol. Odo is made, in 1249, to swear "in no wise to confederate with Richard I," whereas Richard I died in 1199.

SABINE MAID (The) G. Gilfillan, in his introductory essay to Longfellow, says "His ornaments, unlike those of the Sabine maid, have not crushed him." Tarpeia, who opened the gates of Rome to the Sabines, and was crushed to death by their shields, was not a Sabine maid but a Roman.

SCOTT (Sir Walter) In the Heart of Midlothian we read

She [Mrs Deans] amused herself with visiting the dairy and was near discovering herself to Mary Hether by betraying her acquaintance with the celebrated receipt for Dunlop cheese that she compared herself to Bedreddin Hassan, whom the vizier his father in law discovered by his superlative skill in composing cream tarts with pepper in them.

In these few lines are several gross errors

- (1) "cream-tarts should be cheese-cakes,"
- (2) the charge was "that he made cheese-cakes without putting pepper in them," and not that he made "cream-tarts with pepper," (3) it was not the vizier his father-in-law and uncle, but his mother, the widow of Nouredin, who made the discovery, and why? for the best of all reasons—because she herself had taught her son the receipt. The party were at Damascus at the time—Arabian Nights ("Nouredin Ali," etc.) (See next page, "Thackeray")

What! said Bedreddin "was everything in my house to be broken and destroyed only because I did not put pepper in a cheese-cake?"—Arabian Nights ("Nouredin Ali" etc.).

Again, sir Walter Scott speaks of "the philosopher who appealed from Philip inflamed with wine to Philip in his hours of sobriety" (Antiquary, &c.) This "philosopher" was a poor old woman.

SHAKESPEARE Althæa and the Fire-brand Shakespeare says (2 Henry IV act i sc 2) that "Althæa dreamt she was delivered of a fire-brand" It was not Althæa but Hecuba who dreamed, a little before Paris was born, that her offspring was a brand that consumed the kingdom. The tale of Althæa is, that the Fates laid a log of wood on a fire, and told her that her son would live till that log was consumed, whereupon she snatched up the log and kept it from the fire, till one day her son Meleager offended her, when she flung the log on the fire, and her son died, as the Fates predicted.

Bohemia's Coast In the Winter's Tale "the vessel bearing the infant Perdita is driven by storm on the coast of Bohemia," but Bohemia has no sea-board at all.

In Coriolanus Shakespeare makes Volturnia the mother, and Virginia the wife, of Coriolanus, but his wife was Volumnia, and his mother Veturia.

Delphi an Island In the same drama (act iii sc 1) Delphi is spoken of as an island, but Delphi is a city of Phœcis, containing a temple to Apollo. It is no island at all.

Duncan's Murder Macbeth did not murder Duncan in the castle of Inverness, as stated in the play, but at "the smith's house," near Elgin (1039).

Elsmore Shakespeare speaks of the "beetling cliff of Elsmore," whereas Elsmore has no cliffs at all.

What if it [the ghost] tempts you to the food
Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff
That beetles o'er its base into the sea!

Hamlet act i sc. 4

The Ghost, in Hamlet, is evidently a Roman Catholic he talks of purgatory, absolution, and other catholic dogmas, but the Danes at the time were pagans.

St Louis Shakespeare, in Henry V act i sc 2, calls Louis X "St. Louis," but "St. Louis" was Louis IX. It was Louis IX whose "grandmother was Isabel," issue of Charles de Lorraine, the last of the Carolingians. Louis X was the son of Philippe IV (le Bel), and grandson of Philippe III and "Isabel of Aragon," not Isabel "heir of Capet, of the line of Charles the duke of Lorraine."

Macbeth was no tyrant, as Shakespeare makes him out to be, but a firm and equitable prince, whose title to the throne was better than that of Duncan.

Again, Macbeth was not slain by Macduff at Dunsinane, but made his escape from the battle, and was slain, in 1056, at Lumphannan—Lardner, Cabinet Cyc, 17-19.

In The Winter's Tale, act v sc 2, one of the gentlemen refers to Julio Romano, the Italian artist and architect (1492-1546), certainly some 1800 years or more before Romano was born.

In Twelfth Night, the Illyrian clown speaks of "St. Bennet's Church, London." "The tripler, sir, is a good tripping measure, or the bells of St. Bennet's sure may put you in mind one, two, three" (act i sc 1), as if the duke was a Londoner.

SIR SATURN Bacchus or Saturn? In the Fairy Queen, in 11, Britomart saw in the castle of Bu'sirane (8 syl), a picture descriptive of the love of Saturn, who had changed himself into a centaur out of love for Lig'oné. It was not Saturn but Bacchus who loved Lig'oné, and he was not transformed to a centaur, but to a horse.

Benoné or Anoné? In bk vi 9 (Fairy Queen) the lady-love of Paris is called Benoné, which ought to be Anoné. The poet says that Paris was "by Pterippus' brook," when the golden apple was brought to him, but no such brook is mentioned by any classic author.

Critias and Socrates In bk ii 7 (Fairy Queen) Spenser says "The wise Socrates poured out his life to the dear Critias, his dearest beloved." It was not Socrates but Hieraménides, one of the thirty tyrants, who, in quaffing the poison-cup, said smiling, "Thus I drink to the health of fair Critias."—Cicero, Tusculan Questions.

Critias or Crito? In Fairy Queen, ii. (introduction), Spenser says that Socrates often discoursed of love to his friend Critias, but it was Crito, or rather Criton, that the poet means.

Cyprus and Paphos Spenser makes sir Seudamore speak of a temple of Venus, far more beautiful than "that in Paphos or that in Cyprus," but Paphos was merely a town in the island of Cyprus, and the "two" are but one and the same temple—Faery Queen, iv 10

Hippomanês Spenser calls "the Lubran young man" (ii 7), but he was a Boeotian. In cant II ix 29, he says "More whott than Æta" or flaming Mongiball," but the latter is the Arabic name of Ætna.

Tennyson, in the Last Tournament, says (ver 1), Dagonet was knighted in mockery by sir Gawain, but in the History of Prince Arthur we are distinctly told that king Arthur knighted him with his own hand (pt ii 91).

In Gareth and Lynette the same poet says that Gareth was the son of Lot and Bellefant, but we are told a score times and more in the History of Prince Arthur, that he was the son of Margawse (Arthur's sister and Lot's wife, pt. i 36).

King Lot wedded Margawse. Ventres wedded Elaine.—Sir T Malory History of Prince Arthur I 2, 3o 38.

In the same Idyll Tennyson has changed Lionês to Lionors, but, according to the collection of romances edited by sir T Malory, these were quite different persons. Lionês, daughter of sir Persaunt, and sister of Linet of Castle Perilous, married sir Gareth (pt i 153), but Lionors was the daughter of earl Sanam, and was the unwed mother of sir Borre by king Arthur (pt i 15).

Again, Tennyson makes Gareth marry Lynette, and leaves the true heroine, Lionors, in the cold, but the History makes Gareth marry Lionês (Lyonors), and Gaheris his brother marries Linet.

Thus ends the history of sir Gareth that wedded Dame Linet of the Castle Perilous, and also of sir Gaheris, who wedded her sister Dame Linet.—Sir T Malory History of Prince Arthur (end of pt i).

Again, in Gareth and Lynette, by erroneously beginning day with sunrise instead of the previous eve, Tennyson reverses the order of the knights, and makes the fresh green morn represent the decline of day, or, as he calls it, "Hesperus" or "Evening Star", and the blue star of evening he makes "Phosphorus" or the "Morning Star."

Once more, in Gareth and Lynette the poet-laureate makes the combat between Gareth and Death finished at a single blow, but in the History Gareth fights from dawn to dewy eve.

Thus they fought (from sunrise) till it was past noon and would not stint, till at last both lacked wind and then stood they wagging staggering panting blowing and bleeding and when they had rested them awhile they went to battle again trasing raising and forning as two boars. Thus they endured till evening song time.—Sir T Malory History of Prince Arthur I 136.

In the Last Tournament Tennyson makes sir Tristram stabbed to death by sir Mark in Tintag'il Castle, Cornwall, while toying with his aunt, Isolt the Fair, but in the History he is in bed in Brittany, severely wounded, and dies of a shock, because his wife tells him the ship in which he expected his aunt to come was sailing into port with a black sail instead of a white one.

The poet-laureate has deviated so often from the collection of tales edited by sir Thomas Malory, that it would occupy too much space to point out his deviations even in the briefest manner.

THACKERAY, in Vanity Fair, has taken from sir Walter Scott his allusion to Bedreddin, and not from the Arabian Nights. He has, therefore, fallen into the same error, and added two more. He says "I ought to have remembered the pepper which the princess of Persia puts into the cream-tarts in India sir" (ch iii). The charge was that Bedreddin made his cheese-cakes without putting pepper into them. But Thackeray has committed in this allusion other blunders. It was not a "princess" at all, but Bedreddin Hassan, who for the nonce had become a confectioner. He learned the art of making cheese-cakes from his mother (a widow). Again, it was not a "princess of Persia," for Bedreddin's mother was the widow of the vizier of Balsora, at that time quite independent of Persia.

VICTOR HUGO, in Les Travailleurs de la Mer, renders "the frith of Forth" by the phrase Premier des quartic, mistaking "frith" for first, and "Forth" for fourth or four. In his Marie Tudor he refers to the "History and Annals of Henry VII per Franc Baronum," meaning "Historia, etc, Henrici Septimi, per Franciseum Baronum." He calls Barlyll Fidro a common British pitronymic.

VIRGIL has placed Æneas in a harbour which did not exist at the time. "Portusquo require Velnos" (Æneid, vi 366). It is Curus Dentatus who cut a gorge through the rocks to let the waters of the Velinus into the Nar. Before this was done, the Velinus was merely a number of stagnant lakes and the blunder is about the same as if a modern poet were to make Columbus pass through the Suez Canal.

In Æneid iii 171, Virgil makes Æneas speak of "Ausonia," but as Italy was so called from Auson, son of Ulysses and Calypso, of course Æneas could not have known the name.

Again, in Æneid, iv 571, he represents Chorineus as slain by Asylus, but in bk xii 298 he is alive again. Thus

Chorineus sternit Asyla

Bk. ix. 571

Then

*Obvius ambustus lotrem Chorineus ab ara
Corripit et renitent Eluso plagnique ferent
Occupat os flumina, etc.*

Bk. xii. 298, etc.

Again, in bk ix Numia is slain by Nisus (ver 551), but in bk x 562 Numia is alive, and Æneas kills him.

Er'rua ("the mad-cap"), a young man whose wit defeated the strength of the giant Tartaro (a sort of one-eyed Polypheme). Thus the first competition was in throwing a stone. The giant threw his stone, but Errua threw a bird, which the giant supposed to be a stone, and as it flew out of sight, Errua won the wager. The next wager was to throw a bar of iron. After the giant had thrown Errua said, "From here to Salamanca," whereupon the giant bade him not to throw, lest the bar of iron should kill his father and mother, who lived there, so the giant lost the second wager. The third was to pull a tree up by the roots, and the giant gave in because Errua had run a cord round a host of trees, and said, "You pull up one, but I pull up all these." The next exploit was at bed-time. Errua was to sleep in a certain bed, but he placed a dead man in the bed, while he himself got under it. At midnight Tartaro took his club and belaboured the dead body most unmercifully. When Errua stood before Tartaro next morning, the giant was dumfounded. He asked Errua how he had slept. "Excellently well," said Errua, "but somewhat troubled by fleas." Other trials were made, but always in favour of Errua. At length a race was proposed, and Errua sewed into a bag the bowels of a pig. When he started, he cut the bag, strewing the bowels on the road. When Tartaro was told that his rival had done this to make himself more fleet, he cut his belly, and of course killed himself.—Rev W Webster, Lasque Legends (1877).

Est-il-Possible? a nickname given to George of Denmark (queen Anne's husband), because his general remark to the most startling announcement was Est-il possible? With this exclamation he exhausted the rials of his wrath. It was James II who gave him the sobriquet.

Est'mere (2 syl.), king of England. He went with his younger brother Adler to the court of king Adlands, to crave his daughter in marriage, but king Adlands replied that Breinar, the sowdan or sultan of Spain, had forestalled him. However, the lady, being consulted, gave her voice in favour of the king of England. While Est'mere and his brother went to make preparations for the wedding, the "sowdan" arrived, and demanded the lady to wife. A messenger was immediately despatched to inform Est'mere, and the two brothers returned, disguised as a harper and his boy. They gained entrance into the palace, and Adler sang, saying, "O lady, this is thy own true love, no harper, but a king," and then drawing his sword he slew the "sowdan." Est'mere at the same time arising from the hall the "hempert men." Being now master of the position, Est'mere took "the ladye faire," made her his wife, and brought her home to England — Percy, Reliques, I: 5

Dryden Polydoron vi. (1711)

Ete'ocles and Polyn'ces, the two sons of Oedipus. After the expulsion of their father, these two young princes agreed to reign alternate years in Thebes. Eteocles, being the elder, took the first turn, but at the close of the year refused to resign the sceptre to his brother, whereupon Polynices, aided by six other chiefs, laid siege to the city. The two brothers met in combat, and each was slain by the other's hand.

* * A similar fratricidal struggle is told of don Pedro of Castile and his half-brother don Henry. When don Pedro had estranged the Castilians by his cruelty, don Henry invaded Castile with a body of French auxiliaries, and took his brother prisoner. Don Henry visited him in prison, and the two brothers fell on each other like lions. Henry wounded Pedro in the face, but fell over a bench, when Pedro seized him. At that moment a Frenchman seized Pedro by the leg, tossed him over, and Henry slew him — Menard, History of Du Guesclin.

Ethiop's Queen, referred to by Milton in his Il Penseroso, was Cassiope'a, wife of Cepheus (2 syl.) king of Ethiopia. Boasting that she was fairer than the sea-nymphs, she offended the Nereids, who complained to Neptune. Old father Iarke-Shraker sent a huge sea-monster to ravage her kingdom for her insolence. At death Cassiopea was made a constellation of thirteen stars.

Ethnic Plot The "Popish Plot" is so called in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel. As Dryden calls the royalists "Jews," and calls Charles II. "David king of the Jews," the papists were "Gentiles" (or Ethnoi), whence the "Ethnic Plot" means the plot of the Ethnoi against the people of God — Pt 1 (1681)

Etteilla, the pseudonym of Alliette (spelt backwards), a perruquier and diviner of the eighteenth century. He became a professed cabalist, and was visited in his studio in the Hôtel de Clillon (Rue de la Verrière), by all those who desired to unroll the Book of Fate. In 1783 he published Manière de se Récréer avec le Jeu de Cartes, nommées Tarots. In the British Museum are some divination cards published in Paris in the first half of the nineteenth century, called Grand Etteilla and Petit Etteilla, each pack being accompanied with a book of explication and instruction.

Etty's Nine Pictures, "the Combat," the three "Judith" pictures, "Benaiah," "Ulysses and the Sirens," and the three pictures of "Joan of Arc"

My mind says Etty in all my great pictures has been to print some great moral on the heart. The Combat represents the beauty of mercy the three Judith pictures patriotism [1 self-devotion to God 2 self devotion to man 3 self-devotion to country] Benaiah David's chief captain represents valour Ulysses and the Sirens, sensual delights or the wages of sin is death and the three pictures of Joan of Arc depict religion loyalty and patriotism. In all nine in number as it was my desire to print three times three." — William Etty of York (1787-1842)

Et'zel or Ez'zel (i.e. Attila), king of the Huns, in the songs of the German minnesingers. A ruler over three kingdoms and thirty principalities. His second wife was Kriemhild, the widow of Siegfried. In pt II of the Nibelungen Lied, he sees his sons and hagemen stricken down without making the least effort to save them, and is as unlike the Attila of history as a "hector" is to the noble Trojan "the protector of mankind."

Eudoc'ia (4 syl), daughter of Fu'nicus governor of Damascus. Pho'- cias, general of the Syrian forces, being in love with her, asks the consent of Funicus, and is refused. In revenge, he goes over to the Arabs, who are besieging Damascus. Eudoc'ia is taken captive, but refuses to wed a traitor. At the end, Pho'cias dies, and Eudoc'ia returns into a nunnery. —*John Hughes, The Siege of the poet was stepping on the confines of our earth, he turned to see if Furydief was following, and just caught a glance of her as she was snatched back into the shades below.

(Pope tells the tale in his Pindaric poem, called Od' or St. Cecilia's Pa., 1709.)

Furytion, the herdsman of Gerion. He never slept day nor night but walked unceasingly among his herds with his two-headed dog Orthros. "Hercules them all did overcome" — Spenser, Faery Queen v. 10 (1596).

Eustace one of the attendants of sir Reginald Front de Bœuf (a follower of prince John) — Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Fistoe (Fister), or "father Iustatus," the superior and afterwards abbot of St. Mary's. He was formerly William Allan, and the friend of Henry Warden (afterwards the protestant preacher) — Sir W. Scott, The Monastery, (time, Elizabeth).

Fustee (Cristee), a pupil of Ignatius Polyglot. He has been claustrally married for four years, and has a little son named Frederick. Charles Fustee confides his scrape to Polyglot, and conceals his young wife in the tutor's private room. Polyglot is thought to be a libertine, but the truth comes out, and all parties are reconciled — J. Poole, The Scapegoat.

Fustee (Jack), the lover of Lucinda, and "a very worthy young fellow," of good character and family. As justice Woodcock was averse to the marriage, Jack introduced himself as a music-master and sir William Meadows, who recognized him, persuaded the justice to consent to the marriage of the young couple. This he was the more ready to do as his sister Deborah said positively he "should not do it." — Leitchcraft, Love in a Village.

Euthanasia, an easy, happy death. The word occurs in the Dunciad, and Byron has a poem so entitled. Euthanasia generally means a harbour of rest and peace after the storm of life. "In exitum, spes et fortuna valde," i.e. "I have found my euthanasia, farewell to the battle of life" (Greek, eu thnatos, "a happy death").

I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of euthanasia," said Horace. "I then it came to be with the consent of the victim." — Mrs. Oshpang, Lady Jane, III. 6.

Eva, daughter of Torquil of the Oak. She is betrothed to Leifhard Day — Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Evadne (3 vol.), a wife of haplessus (3 vol.). She threw herself on the funeral pile of her husband, and was consumed with him.

Evadne (3 vol.), sister of Melantus. Amintor was compelled by the king to marry her, although he was betrothed to Aperi (the "maid" whose death forms the tragical event of the drama) — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Maid's Tragedy (1610).

The story of the death of Evadne is a famous story, and is told in the book of the king, which is a very good one. The story of the death of Evadne is a famous story, and is told in the book of the king, which is a very good one.

Evadne of the Statue, a drama by Shelley (1820). In this, the chief minister of Naples, Iudovic, conspires to murder the king, and seize the crown, his first stumbling-block is the marriage of Colonna, a high-minded nobleman, who cannot be corrupted. The sister of the marriage is Evadne (3 vol.), pledged to Vincentio Iudovic's scheme is to get Colonna to murder Vincentio and the king, and then to delude Evadne. With this in view, he persuades Vincentio that Evadne is the king's sister, and that she marries him secretly as a flimsy cloak, but he adds "Never mind, it will make your fortune." The proud Neapolitan is distressed, and flings off Evadne as a viper. Her brother is indignant, challenges the troth-pluht lover to a duel, and Vincentio falls. Iudovic now irritates Colonna by telling him of the king's amour, and induces him to invite the king to a banquet and then murder him. The king goes to the banquet, and Evadne shows him the statues of the Colonna family, and amongst them one of her own father, who at the battle of Milan had saved the king's life by his own. The king is struck with remorse, but at this moment Iudovic enters, and the king conceals himself behind the statue. Colonna tells the traitor murder the deed is done, and Iudovic orders his instant arrest, gives him as his duty, and exclaims, "Now I am king, indeed!" At this moment the king comes forward, releases Colonna, and orders Iudovic to be arrested. The traitor draws his sword, and Colonna kills him. Vientio now enters, tells how his ear has been abused, and marries Vientio.

Evan Dhu of Lochiel, a Highland chief in the army of Montrose—Sir W. Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.)

Evan Dhu M'Combich, the foster-brother of M'Hor—Sir W. Scott, Waverley (time, George II.)

Evandale (The Right Hon. W. Maxwell, lord), in the royal army under the duke of Monmouth. He is a suitor of Edith Bellenden, the granddaughter of lady Margaret Bellenden, of the Tower of Tilhetudlem—Sir W. Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II.)

Evan'der, the "good old king of Syracuse," dethroned by Dionysius the Younger. Evander had dethroned the elder Dionysius "and sent him for vile subsistence, a wandering sophist through the realms of Greece." He was the father of Euphrasia, and was kept in a dungeon on the top of a rock, where he would have been starved to death, if Euphrasia had not nourished him with "the milk designed for her own babe." When Syracuse was taken by Timoleon, Dionysius by accident came upon Evander, and would have killed him, but Euphrasia rushed forward and stabbed the tyrant to the heart—A. Murphy, The Grecian Daughter (1772). (See ERRORS OF AUTHORS, "Dionysius," p. 304.)

Mr Bentley May 6 1796 took leave of the stage in the character of Evander—"W. G. Russell, Representative Actors 425.

Evangelic Doctor (The), John Wicliffe, "the Morning Star of the Reformation" (1324-1384).

Evangeline, the heroine and title of a tale in hexameter verse by Longfellow, in two parts. Evangeline was the daughter of Benedict Bellefontaine, the richest farmer of Acadia (now Nova Scotia). At the age of 17 she was legally betrothed by the notary-public to Gabriel son of Basil the blacksmith, but next day all the colony was exiled by the order of George II., and their houses, cattle, and lands were confiscated. Gabriel and Evangeline were parted, and now begin the troubles of her life. She wandered from place to place to find her betrothed. Basil had settled at Louisiana, but when Evangeline reached the place Gabriel had just left, she then went to the prairies, to Michigan, and so on, but at every place she was just too late to catch him. At length, grown old in this hopeless search, she went to Pennsylvania and became a sister of mercy. The plague broke out in the city, and as she visited the almshouse she saw an old man smitten down with the pestilence. It was Gabriel. He tried to whisper her name, but death closed his lips. He was buried, and Evangeline lies beside him in the grave. (Longfellow's Evangeline (1849) has many points of close similitude with Campbell's tale of Gertrude of Wyoming, 1809.)

Evans (Sir Hugh), a pedantic Welsh parson and schoolmaster of extraordinary simplicity and native shrewdness—Shakespeare, The Merry Wives of Windsor (1601).

The reader may cry out with honest sir Hugh Francis I like not when a comyn has a great peard.—Macaulay.

Henderson says I have seen John Edwin in sir Hugh Evans, when preparing for the duel keep the house in an ecstasy of merriment for many minutes together without speaking a word. (1750-1790).

Evans (William), the giant porter of Charles I. He carried sir Geoffrey Hudson about in his pocket. Evans was eight feet in height, and Hudson only eighteen inches. Fuller mentions this giant amongst his Worthies—Sir W. Scott, Peter of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Evan'the (3 syl), sister of Sora'no, the wicked instrument of Frederick duke of Naples, and the chaste wife of Valerio. The duke tried to seduce her, but failing in this scandalous attempt, offered to give her to any one "for a month," at the end of which time the libertine was to suffer death. No one would accept the offer, and ultimately Evan'the was restored to her husband—Beaumont and Fletcher, A Wife for a Month (1624).

Eve (1 syl) or Havah, the "mother of all living" (Gen iii 20). Before the expulsion from paradise her name was Ishah, because she was taken out of ish, i.e. "man" (Gen ii 23).

Eve was of such gigantic stature that when she laid her head on one hill near Mecca, her knees rested on two other hills in the plain about two gun shots asunder. Adam was as tall as a palm tree.—Moncony Logique 1372 etc.

Evelina (4 syl), the heroine of a novel so called by Miss Burney (afterwards Mde D'Arlin). Evelina marries lord Orville (1778).

Evelyn (Alfred), the secretary and relative of sir John Vesey. He made sir John's speeches, wrote his pamphlets, got together his facts, mended his pens, and received no salary. Evelyn loved

Clara Douglas, a dependent of lady Franklins, but she was poor also, and declined to marry him. Scarcely had she refused him, when he was left an immense fortune and proposed to Georgina Verev. What little heart Georgina had was given to sir Frederick Blount, but the great fortune of Evelyn made her waver, however, being told that Evelyn's property was insecure, she married Frederick, and left Evelyn free to marry Clara—Lord L. Bulwer Lytton, Money (1840)

Evelyn (Sir George), a man of fortune, family, and character, in love with Dorrillon, whom he marries—Mrs Inchbald, Wives as they Were and Maids as they Are (1795)

Even Numbers are reckoned unlucky

The crow cried twice this even etc is no good number—S. E. The Honest Lawyer (1616)

Among the Chinese Heaven is odd, and earth even. The numbers 1 3 5 7 9 belong to yang or heaven but 2 4 6 8 10 belong to yin or earth.—Perr Mr Edkin

Shakespeare says "there is divinity in odd numbers" (Merry Wives of Windsor, act i. sc 1, 1596)

Everard (Colonel Markham), of the Commonwealth party

Master Everard, the colonel's father—Sir W. Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Everett (Master), a hired witness of the "Popish Plot"—Sir W. Scott, Peter of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Every Man in His Humour, a comedy by Ben Jonson (1598). The original play was altered by David Garrick. The persons to whom the title of the drama apply are "captain Bobadil," whose humour is bragging of his brave deeds and military courage—he is thrashed as a coward by Downright, "Kitch," whose humour is jealousy of his wife—he is befooled and cured by a trick played on him by Brainworm, "Stephen," whose humour is verdant stupidity—he is played on by every one, "Knowell," whose humour is suspicion of his son Edward, which turns out to be all moonshine, "Dame Kitchy," whose humour is jealousy of her husband, but she (like her husband) is cured by a trick devised by Brainworm. Every man in his humour is liable to be duped thereby, for his humour is the "Achilles' heel" of his character

Every Man out of His Humour, a comedy by Ben Jonson (1599)

Every One has His Fault, a comedy by Mrs Inchbald (1794). By the fault of rigid pride, lord Norland discarded his daughter, lady Eleanor, because she married against his consent. By the fault of gallantry and defect of due courtesy to his wife, sir Robert Ramble drove lady Rumble into a divorce. By the fault of irresolution, "Shall I marry or shall I not?" Solus remained a miserable bachelor, pining for a wife and domestic joys. By the fault of deficient spirit and manliness, Mr Placid was a hen-pecked husband. By the fault of marrying without the consent of his wife's friends, Mr Irwin was reduced to poverty and even crime. Harmony healed these faults. Lord Norland received his daughter into favour, sir Robert Ramble took back his wife, Solus married Miss Spinster, Mr Placid assumed the rights of the head of the family, and Mr Irwin, being accepted as the son-in-law of lord Norland, was raised from indigence to domestic comfort

Evil May-Day, May 1, 1517, when the apprentices committed great excesses, especially against foreigners, and the constable of the Tower discharged his cannons on the populace. The tumult began in Cheapside (time, Henry VIII)

Eviot, page to sir John Ramorny (master of the horse to prince Robert of Scotland)—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Evir-Allen, the white-armed daughter of Branno an Irishman. "A thousand heroes sought the maid, she refused her love to a thousand. The sons of the sword were despised, for graceful in her eyes was Ossian." Thus Evir-Allen was the mother of Oscar, Fingal's grandson, but she was not alive when Fingal went to Ireland to assist Cormac against the invading Norsemen, which forms the subject of the poem called Fingal, in six books—Ossian, Fingal, ii

Ewain (Sir), son of king Vrience and Morgan le Fay (Arthur's half-sister)—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i. 72 (1170)

Ewan of Brigglands, a horse-soldier in the army of Montrose—Sir W. Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

Ewart (Nanty, i.e. Anthony), captain of the smuggler's brig—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Excalibur, King Arthurs famous swords 'There seems to have been two of the swords so called. One was the sword sheathed in stone, which no one could draw thence, save he who was to be king of the land. Above 200 knights tried to release it, but failed, Arthur alone could draw it with ease, and thus proved his right of succession (pt 1 3). In ch 7 this sword is called Excalibur, and is said to have been so bright "that it gave light like thirty torches." After his fight with Pellinore, the king said to Merlin he had no sword, and Merlin took him to a lake, and Arthur saw an arm "clothed in white samite, that held a fair sword in the hand." Presently the Lady of the Lake appeared, and Arthur begged that he might have the sword, and the lady told him to go and fetch it. When he came to it he took it, "and the arm and hand went under the water again." This is the sword generally called Excalibur. When about to die, King Arthur sent an attendant to cast the sword back again into the lake, and again the hand "clothed in white samite" appeared, caught it, and disappeared (ch 23).—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 3, 23 (1470)

Excalibur (pt 1 3, 23 (1470))

Excalibur's Sheath. "Sir," said Merlin, "look that ye keep well the scabbard of Excalibur, for ye shall lose no blood as long as ye have the scabbard upon you, though ye have never so many wounds"—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 36 (1470)

Executioner (No). When Francis viscount d'Aspremont, governor of Bayonne, was commanded by Charles IX of France to massacre the huguenots, he replied, "Sire, there are many under my government devoted to your majesty, but not a single executioner."

Exhausted Worlds. Dr Johnson, in the prologue spoken by Garrick at the opening of Drury Lane, in 1717, says of Shakespeare

Each change of many-coloured life he drew Exhausted worlds and then imagined new

Exterminator (The). Montbars, chief of a set of filibusters in the seventeenth century. He was a native of Languedoc, and conceived an intense hatred against the Spaniards on reading their cruelties in the New World. He died at Havre, in 1667, Montbars attacked the Spaniards in the Antilles and in Honduras, took from them Vera Cruz and Carthagena, and slew them most mercilessly wherever he encountered them (1615-1707)

Extra (That's). That's Extra, as the woman said when she saw Kerton (a Devonshire saying), that is, "I thought my work was done, but there are more last words." "The office closes at four (but that's only Kerton), there is much work still to do before the day's work is done (or before we reach Extra)." "Extra" is a popular pronunciation of Exeter, and "Kerton" is Creditor. The woman was walking to Exeter for the first time, and when she reached the grand old church of Kerton or Creditor, supposed it to be Exeter Cathedral. "That's Exeter Cathedral," she said, "and the end of my journey." But it was only Kerton Church, and she had still eight more miles to walk before she got to Exeter.

Eye Terrible as the eye of Vathel. One of the eyes of this caliph was so terrible in anger that those died who ventured to look thereon, and had he given way to his wrath, he would have depopulated his whole dominion.—W. Beckford, Vathel (1784)

Eye-bright or Euphrasia ("yoy-gung"). So called from its reputed power in restoring impaired vision.

[The hermit's fumitory gets and eye-bright for the eye,
Dryden Polyolbon, xiii (1613)]

Eye of the Baltic (The). Gotland or Gothland, an island in the Baltic.

Eye of Greece (The), Athens

Athen, the eye of Greece, mother of arts
And eloquence native to famous wits

Milton

 Sometimes Sparta is called "The Eye of Greece" also

Eyes (Grey). With the Arabs, grey eyes are synonymous with sin and enmity. Hence in the Korân, x, we read "On that day the trumpet shall be sounded, and we will gather the wicked together, even those having grey eyes." Al Bidawi explains this as referring to the Greeks, whom the Arabs detest, and he calls "red whiskers and grey eyes" an idiomatic phrase for "a foe."

Eyed (One-) people. The Arimaspians of Scythia were a one-eyed people.

The Cyclops were giants with only one eye, and that in the middle of the forehead.

Tartaro, in Basque legends, was a one-eyed giant. Sindbad the sailor, in his third voyage, was cast on an island inhabited by one-eyed giants.

Eyre (Jan), a governess, who stoutly ropes with adverse circumstances, and ultimately marries a used-up man of fortune, in whom the germs of good feeling and sound sense were only exhausted and not destroyed—Charlotte Bronte, Jane Eyre (1847).

Ez'zelin (Sir), the gentleman who recognizes Lara at the table of lord Otho, and charges him with being Conrad the corsair. A duel ensues, and Ez'zelin is never heard of more. A serf used to say that he saw a huntsman one evening cast a dead body into the river which divided the lands of Otho and Lara, and that there was a star of knighthood on the breast of the corpse—Byron, Lara (1814).

F.

F's (The Three) Fixed tenure, Fair rent, Free sale—Irish Land League (1880-81).

Faa (Gabriel), nephew of Meg Merrilies. One of the huntsmen at Liddesdale—Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Fab'ila, a king devoted to the chase. One day he encountered a wild boar, and commanded those who rode with him not to interfere, but the boar overthrew him and gored him to death—Chronica Antiqua de España, 121.

Fa'bius (The American), George Washington (1732-1799).

Fa'bus (The French), Anne duc de Montmorency, grand-constable of France (1493-1567).

Fabricius [Fa brish' e us], an old Roman, like Cincinnatus and Curius Dentatus, a type of the rigid purity, frugality, and honesty of the "good old times." Parrhos uses every effort to corrupt him by bribes, or to terrify him, but in vain. "Excellent Fabricius," cried the Greek, "one might hope to turn the sun from its course as soon as turn Fabricius from the path of duty."

Fabric'us, an author, whose composition was so obscure that Gil Blas could not comprehend the meaning of a single line of his writings. His poetry was verbose and his prose a maze of far-fetched expressions and perplexed phrases.

If not intelligible," said Fabricius, "so much the better. The natural and simple won't do for sonnets, odes and the sublime. The merit of these is their obscurity and it is quite sufficient if the author himself thinks he understands them. There are five or six of us who have undertaken to introduce a thorough change and we will do so in spite of Lope de Vega, Cervantes, and all the fine geniuses who carl at us."—Lease Gil Blas v 12 (1724).

Fabrit'io, a merry soldier, the friend of captain Jac'omo the woman-hater—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Captain (1613).

Face (1 syl), alias "Jeremy," house-servant of Lovewit. During the absence of his master, Face leagues with Subtle (the alchemist) and Dol Common to turn a penny by alchemy, fortune-telling, and magic. Subtle (a beggar who knew something about alchemy) was discovered by Face near Pie Corner. Assuming the philosopher's garb and wand, he called himself "doctor," Face, arrogating the title of "captain," touted for dupes, while Dol Common kept the house, and aided the other two in their general scheme of deception. On the unexpected return of Lovewit, the whole thing blew up, but Face was forgiven, and continued in his place as house-servant—Ben Jonson, The Alchemist (1610).

Fair Penitent (The), a tragedy by Rowe (1703) Calista was daughter of lord Sciolto (3 syl), and bride of lord Al'tamont It was destroyed on the wedding day that she had been seduced by Lothario. This led to a duel between the bridegroom and the libertine, in which Lothario was killed, a street riot ensued, in which Sciolto received his death-wound, and Calista, "the fair penitent," stabbed herself. This drama is a mere rechauffe of Massinger's Late Reckoning.

Fairstar (Princess), daughter of queen Blondina (who had at one birth two boys and a girl, all "with stars on their foreheads, and a chain of gold about their necks"). On the same day, Blondina's sister Brunetta (wife of the king's brother) had a son, afterwards called Chery. The queen-mother, wishing to destroy these four children, ordered Fairstar to strangle them, but Fairstar sent them adrift in a boat, and told the queen-mother they were gone. It so happened that the boat was seen by a corsair, who brought the children to his wife Corisina to bring up. The corsair soon grew immensely rich, because every time the hair of these children was combed, jewels fell from their heads. When grown up, these castaways went to the hand of their royal father and his brother, but Chery was for a while employed in getting for Iar-tar (1) The diamond water, which had the gift of imparting beauty, (2) The sun-apple, which had the gift of imparting wit, and (3) The queen bird, which could reveal all secrets. By this time the story of their birth was made known, and Fairstar married her cousin Chery — Comte de D'Annoy, Fairy Tales ('Princess Fairstar,' 1682).

Faithful Shepherdess (The), a pastoral drama by John Fletcher (1610). The "Faithful Shepherdess" is a carol, whose lover was dead. Faithful to his memory, Corn retired from the busy world employing her time in works of humanity, such as healing the sick, exorcising the bewitched, and comforting the afflicted.

Fakar (Wah), Mahomet's scimitar.

Fakenham Ghost (The). An old woman, walking to Fakenham, had to cross the churchyard after night-fall. She heard a short, quick step behind, and looking round saw what she fancied to be a four-footed monster. On she ran, faster and faster, and on came the pattering ing footfalls behind. She gained the churchyard gate and pushed it open, but, ah! "the monster" also passed through! Every moment she expected it would leap upon her back. She reached her cottage door and fainted. Out came her husband with a lantern, saw the "sprite," which was no other than the foal of a donkey that had strayed into the park and followed the ancient dame to her cottage door.

And many a laugh went through the vale
And some conviction, too
Each thought some other goblin tale
Perhaps was just as true.
P. Bloomfield The Fakenham Ghost (a fact).

Falero (Marino), the doge of Venice, an old man who married a young wife named Angiolina (3 syl). At a banquet, Michel Steno, a young patrician, grossly insulted some of the ladies and was by the order of the doge, turned out of the house. In revenge, Steno plucked the doge's chair with some scurrilous verses upon the young dogaresa, and Falero referred the matter to "the lordy." The council sentenced Steno to two months' imprisonment, and the doge deemed this punishment so inadequate to the offence, that he looked upon it as a personal insult, and headed a conspiracy to cut off, root and branch, the whole Venetian nobility. The project being discovered, Falero was put to death (1355), at the age of 76, and his picture removed from the gallery of his brother doges — Byron, Marino Falero.

Falkland, an aristocratic gentleman, of a noble, loving nature, but the victim of false honour and morbid refinement of feeling. Under great provocation, he was goaded on to commit murder, but being tried was honourably acquitted, and another person was executed for the crime. Caleb Williams, a lad in Falkland's service, accidentally became acquainted with these secret facts, but, unable to live in the house under the suspicious eyes of Falkland, he ran away. Falkland tracked him from place to place, like a blood-hound, and at length arrested him for robbery. The true statement now came out, and Falkland died of shame and a broken spirit — W. Godwin, Caleb Williams (1794) (See FALKLAND).

* * * This tale has been dramatized by G. Colman, under the title of The Iron Chest, in which Falkland is called "Sir Edward Mortimer," and Caleb Williams is called "Wilford."

False One (The), a tragedy by Beaumont and Fletcher (1619). The subject is the amours of Julius Cæsar and Cleopatra.

Falsetto (Signor), a man who fawns on Fazio in prosperity, and turns his back on him when fallen into disgrace — Dean Milman, Fazio (1815).

Falstaff (Sir John), in The Merry Wives of Windsor, and in the two parts of Henry IV, by Shakespeare. In Henry V, his death is described by Mrs. Quickly, hostess of an inn in Eastcheap. In the comedy, Sir John is represented as making love to Mrs. Page, who 'fools him to the top of her bent.' In the historic plays, he is represented as a soldier and a wit, the boon companion of "Mad-cap Hal" (the prince of Wales). In both cases, he is a mountain of fat, sensual, mendacious, boastful, and fond of practical jokes.

In the king's army, "sir John" was captain, "Peto" lieutenant, "Pistol" ancient [ensign], and "Bardolph" corporal

C. R. L. He says, "Quia 'Falstaff must have been glorious. Since one Richard Lear but sir John Henderson (1814-1810)." (1814-1810).

(Robert William Elliston (1774-1831) was the best of all "Falstaffs." His was a wonderful combination of wit, humour, sensuality, and philosophy, but he was always the gentleman.)

Falstaff unlimited imitable Falstaff how shall I describe thee? Thou compound of sense and vice of sense which may be admired but not esteemed of vice which may be despised but hardly detested. "Falstaff" is a character loaded with faults, and with those faults which naturally produce contempt. He is a thief and a glutton, a coward and a boaster, always ready to cheat the weak and prey upon the poor, to terrify the timorous and insult the defenceless. At once obsequious and malignant, yet the man thus corrupt, thus despicable makes himself necessary to the prince by perpetual gaiety and by unflinching power of exciting laughter.—Dr Johnson

Famous "I woke one morning and found myself famous." So said Byron, after the publication of cantos 1 and 2 of his Child Harold (1812)

Fanciful (Lady), a vain, conceited beauty, who calls herself "nice, strangely nice," and says she was formed "to make the whole creation uneasy." She loves Heartfree, a rascal against woman, and when he proposes marriage to Belinda, a rival beauty, spreads a most impudent scandal, which, however, reflects only on herself. Heartfree, who at one time was partly in love with her, says to her

'Nature made you handsome gave you beauty to a miracle a shape without a fault, wit enough to make them relish but art has made you become the pity of our sex and the jest of your own. There's not a feature in your face but you have found the way to teach it some affected convulsion. Your feet, your hands your very finger-ends, are directed never to move without some ridiculous air and your language is a suitable trumpet to draw people's eyes upon the vice how" (act II. 3) — Van Brugh, The Provoked Wife (1697).

Fan-Fan, alias Pheln O'Tug, "a lolly-pop maker, and manufacturer of maids of honour to the court." This merry, shy, and blundering elf, concealed in a bear-skin, makes love to Christine, the faithful attendant on the countess Marie. Pheln O'Tug says his mother was too bashful ever to let him know her, and his father always kept in the background.—E. Stirling, The Prisoner of State (1847)

Fang, a bullying, insolent magistrate, who would have sent Oliver Twist to prison, on suspicion of theft, if Mr Brownlow had not interposed on the boy's behalf.—C. Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

The original of this ill tempered bullying magistrate was Mr Laving of Hatton Garden removed from the bench by the home secretary.—John Foster Life of Dickens III. 4

Fang and Snare, two sheriff's officers—Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV (1598)

Fanny (Lord) So John lord Hervey was usually called by the wits of the time, in consequence of his effeminate habits. His appearance was that of a "half wit, half fool, half man, half bear." He used rouge, drank ass's milk, and took Scotch pills (1694-1743)

Consult lord Fanny and confide in Curll [publisher]. Byron English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809)

Fanny (Miss), younger daughter of Mr Sterling, a rich City merchant. She was clandestinely married to Lovewell "Gentle-looking, soft-speaking, sweet-smiling, and affable," wanting "nothing but a crook in her hand and a lamb under her arm to be a perfect picture of innocence and simplicity." Every one loved her, and as her marriage was a secret, sir John Melvil and lord Ogleby both proposed to her. Her marriage with Lovewell being ultimately made known, her dilemma was removed.—Colman and Garrick, The Clandestine Marriage (1766)

Farceur (The), Angelo Beolco, 'the Italian farce-writer. Called Ruzzante in Italian, from ruzzare, "to play the fool" (1502-1512)

Farina'ta [DROGLI UBERTI], a noble Florentine, leader of the Ghibelline faction, and driven from his country in 1250 by the Guelphs (1 syl). Some ten years later, by the aid of Manfredi of Naples, he beat the Guelphs, and took all the towns of Tuscany and Florence. Dante conversed with him in the city of Dis, and represents him as lying in a fiery tomb yet open, and not to be closed till the last judgment day. When the council agreed to raze Florence to the ground,

Farnata opposed the measure, and saved the city. Dante refers to this

Lo' Farnata his brow
Somewhat uplilt cried
'In that affray (i.e. at Montapert) near the river

Farm-house (The) Modely and Heartwell, two gentlemen of fashion, come into the country and receive hospitality from old farmer Trechold. Here they make love to his daughter Aura and his niece Flora. The girls, being high-principled, convert the flirtation of the two guests into love, and Heartwell marries the niece, while Modely proposes to Aura, who accepts him, provided he will wait two months and remain constant to her — John Philip Kemble

Farmer George, George III, so called because he was like a farmer in dress, in manners, and tastes (1738-1820)

Farmer's Wife (The), a musical drama by C. Dibdin (1780). Cornflower, a benevolent, high-minded farmer, having saved Emma Belton from the flames of a house on fire, married her, and they lived together in love and peace till sir Charles Courtly took a fancy to Mrs. Cornflower, and abducted her. She was soon tracked, and as it was evident that she was no particeps criminis, she was restored to her husband, and sir Charles gave his sister to Mrs. Cornflower's brother in marriage as a penec offering.

Fashion (Tom) or "Young Fashion," younger brother of Lord Toppington. As his elder brother did not behave well to him, Tom resolved to outwit him, and to this end introduced himself to sir Tun-bell Clumsy and his daughter, Miss Hovden, as lord Toppington, between whom and the knight a negotiation of marriage had been carried on. Being established in the house, Tom married the heiress, and when the veritable lord appeared, he was treated as an impostor. Tom, however, explained his ruse, and as his lordship treated the knight with great contempt and quitted the house, a reconciliation was easily effected — Sheridan, A Trip to Scarborough (1777)

Fashionable Lover (The) Lord Abberville, a young man of 23 years of age, promises marriage to Lucinda Bridgemore, the vulgar, spiteful, purse-proud daughter of a London merchant, living in Fish Street Hill. At the house of this merchant lord Abberville sees a Miss Aubrey, a handsome, modest, lady-like girl, with whom he is greatly smitten. He first tries to corrupt her, and then promises marriage, but Miss Aubrey is already engaged to a Mr. Tyrell. The vulgarity and ill-nature of Lucinda being quite insurmountable, "the fashionable lover" abandons her. The chief object of the drama is to root out the prejudice which Englishmen at one time entertained against the Scotch, and the chief character is in reality Colin or Cawdie Macleod, a Scotch servant of lord Abberville — R. Cumberland (1780)

Fates The three Fatal Sisters were Clotho, Lachesis [Lak'e.sis], and Atropos They dwell in the deep abyss of Demogorgon, "with unwearied fingers drawing out the threads of life" Clotho held the spindle or distaff, Lachesis drew out the thread, and Atropos cut it off

Sad Clotho held the rock the whiles the thread
By grisly Lachesis was spun with pain
That cruel Atropos oftsoon undid
With cur'd knife cutting the twist in twain.
Spenser Fairy Queen, iv 2 (1596)

Father—Son It is a common observation that a father above the common rate of men has usually a son below it Witness king John son of Henry II, Edward II son of Edward I, Richard II son of the Black Prince, Henry VI son of Henry V, Lord Chesterfield's son, etc So in French history Louis VIII was the son of Philippe Auguste, Charles the Idiot was the son of Charles le Sage, Henri II of Francois I Again, in German history Heinrich VI was the son of Barbarossa, Albrecht I of Rudolf, and so on, in all directions Uirum filii noxæ is a Latin proverb

Fatherless Merlin never had a father, his mother was a nun, the daughter of the king of Dimetia

Fathom (Ferdinand count), a villain who robs his benefactors, pillages any one, but is finally forgiven and assisted.—T Smollett, The Adventures of Ferdinand count Fathom (1754)

(The gang being absent, an old bel-dame conveys the count to a rude apartment to sleep in Here he found the dead body of a man lately stabbed and concealed in some straw, and the account of his sensations during the night, the horrid device by which he saved his life (by lifting the corpse into his own bed), and his escape guided by the hag, is terrifically tragic)

The robber scene in the old woman's hut, in Count Fathom though often imitated since still remains one of the most impressive and agitating night pieces of its kind.—Encyc. Brit. Art. Romance

Fatima, daughter of Mahomet, and one of the four perfect women The other three are Khadijah, the prophet's first wife, Mary, daughter of Imrân, and Asia, wife of that Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea

Fat'ima, a holy woman of China, who lived a hermit's life There was "no one affected with headache whom she did not cure by simply laying her hands on them" An African magician induced this devotee to lend him her clothes and stick, and to make him the fac-simile of herself He then murdered her, and got introduced into the palace of Aladdin Aladdin, being informed of the trick, pretended to have a bad headache, and when the false Fatima approached under the pretence of curing it, he plunged a dagger into the heart of the magician and killed him — Arabian Nights ("Aladdin or the Wonderful Lamp")

Fat'ima, the mother of prince Camaralzaman. Her husband was Schah'zaman Sultan of the "Isle of the Children of Kbal'edan, some twenty days' sail from the coast of Persia, in the open sea" — Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badour")

Fat'ima, the last of Bluebeard's wives. She was saved from death by the timely arrival of her brothers with a party of friends — C. Perrault, Contes de Fées (1697)

Fat'imite (3 syl) The Third Fatimite, the caliph Hakem B'amr-ellah, who professed to be incarnate deity, and the last prophet who had communication between God and man. He was the founder of the Druses (q v)

Hakem B'amr-ellah, the Third Fatimite!
Robt. Browning, The Return of the Druses v

Faulconbridge (Philip), called "the Bastard," natural son of King Richard I and lady Robert Faulconbridge. An admirable admixture of greatness and levity, daring and recklessness. He was generous and open-hearted, but hated foreigners like a true-born islander — Shakespeare, King John (1596)

Faulkland, the over-anxious lover of Julia [Melville], always fretting and tormenting himself about her whims, spirit, health, life. Every feature in the sky, every shift of the wind was a source of anxiety to him. If she was gay, he fretted that she should care so little for his absence, if she was low-spirited, he feared she was going to die, if she danced with another, he was jealous, if she didn't, she was out of sorts — Sheridan, The Rivals (1775)

Fault. "Faultily, faultless, icily regular, splendidly null" Tennyson so describes his "Maud"

Fault-bag. A fable says that every man has a bag hanging before him in which he puts his neighbours' faults, and another behind him in which he stows his own

Faust, a famous magician of the sixteenth century, a native of Suhl. A rich uncle having left him a fortune, Faust ran to every excess and when his fortune was exhausted, made a pact with the devil (who assumed the name of Mephistopheles, and the appearance of a little grey monk) that if he might indulge his propensities freely for twenty-four years, he would at the end of that period consign to the devil both body and soul. The compact terminated in 1550, when Faust disappeared. His sweetheart was Margherita [Margaret], whom he seduced, and his faithful servant was Wagner

Goethe has a dramatic poem entitled Faust (1798), Gounod an opera called Faust e Margherita (1859) (See FAUSTUS)

Faustus (Dr), the same as Faust, but Marlowe, in his admirable tragedy, makes the doctor sell himself to Lucifer and Mephistophilis

When Faustus stands on the brink of everlasting night waiting for the fatal moment — a scene of enchanting interest, fervid passion and overwhelming pathos carries captive the sternest heart and proclaims the first triumph of the tragic poet. — J. Chambers, English Literature I, 171

* * W. Bayle Bernard, of Boston, U S America, has a tragedy on the same subject

Favorita (La), Leonora de Guzman, "favourite" of Alfonso XI of Castile. Ferdinand fell in love with her, and the king, to save himself from excommunication, sanctioned the marriage. But when Ferdinand learned that Leonora was the king's mistress, he rejected the alliance with indignation, and became a monk. Leonora also became a novice in the same monastery, saw Ferdinand, obtained his forgiveness, and died — Donizetti, La Favorita (an opera, 1842)

Faw (Tibbie), the ostler's wife, in Wandering Willie's tale — Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Faw'nia, the lady beloved by Demetrius — R. Greene, Pandosto, the Triumph of Time (1588)

* * Shakespeare founded his Winter's Tale on Greene's romance

Fazio, a Florentine, who first tried to make a fortune by alchemy, but being present when Bartoldo died, he buried the body secretly, and stole the miser's money-bags. Being now rich, he passed his time with the marchioness Aldabella in licentious pleasure, and his wife Bianca, out of jealousy, accused him to the duke of being privy to Bartoldo's death. For this offence Fazio was condemned to die, and Bianca, having tried in vain to save him, went mad with grief, and died of a broken heart.—Dean Milman, Fazio (1815)

Fea (Euphane), the old housekeeper of the old udaller at Burgh-Westra. (A "udaller" is one who holds land by allodial tenure).—Sir W Scott, The Puate (time, William III)

Fear Fortress, near Siragossa. An allegorical hogie fort, conjured up by fear, which vanishes as it is courageously approached and boldly besieged.

If a child disappeared, or any cattle were carried off the frightened peasants said, "The lord of Fear Fortress has taken them." If a fire broke out anywhere it was the lord of Fear Fortress who must have lit it. The origin of all accidents, mishaps, and disasters, was traced to the mysterious owner of this invisible castle.—L'Eplne Croquetaine III. 1.

Featherhead (John), Esq., an opponent of Sir Thomas Kittlecourt, M P.—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Fee and Fairy. Fee is the more general term, including the latter. The Arabian Nights are not all fairy tales, but they are all fee tales or contes des fées. So, too, in the Ossianic tales, Campbell's Tales of the West Highland, the mythological tales of the Basques, Irish,

Scandinavians, Germans, French, etc., may all be ranged under fee tales.

Feeble (Francis), a woman's tailor, and one of the recruits of Sir John Falstaff. Although a thin, starveling vaward of a man, he expresses great willingness to be drawn. Sir John compliments him as "courageous Feeble," and says to him, "Thou wilt be as valiant as the wrathful dove, or most magnanimous monse most forcible Feeble"—Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV act iii sc 2 (1598)

Feeder (Mr), B A, usher in the school of Dr Blumber of Brighton. He was "a kind of human barrel organ, which played only one tune." He was in the habit of shaving his head to keep it cool. Mr Feeder married Miss Blumber, the doctor's daughter, and succeeded to the school.—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846)

Feenix, nephew of the Hon Mrs Skewton (mother of Edith, Mr Dombey's second wife). Feenix was a very old gentleman, patched up to look as much like a young fop as possible.

Cousin Feenix was a man about town forty years ago, but he is still so juvenile in figure and manner that strangers are amazed when they discover latent wrinkles in his forehead, his face and crows feet in his eyes. But cousin Feenix getting up at half past seven is quite another thing from cousin Feenix got up.—C Dickens Dombey and Son, xxii. (1846).

Feet like Mice

Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice stole in and out,
As if they feared the light.
Sir John Suckling The Wedding (died 1641)

Feignwell (Colonel), the suitor of Anne Lovely, an heiress. Anne Lovely had to obtain the consent of her four guardians before she could marry. One was an old bean, another a virtuoso, a third a broker on 'Change, and the fourth a canting quaker. The colonel made himself agreeable to all, and carried off his prize.—Mrs Centlivre, A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717)

Andrew Cherry [1769-1812]. His first character was Colonel Feignwell "an arduous task for a boy of 17, but he obtained great applause, and the manager of the sharing company after passing many encomiums on his exertions, presented him with tenpence halfpenny as his dividend of the profits of the night's performance.—Percy Ance dotes

Feinaigle (Gregory de), a German mnemonist (1765-1820). He obtained some success by his aids to memory, but in Paris he was an object of ridicule.

Her memory was a nuisance
For her Feinaigle's was a useless art.
Byron, Don Juan I. 11 (1819)

Felce, wife of sir Guy of Warwick, said to have "the same high forehead as Venus"

Felician (Father), the catholic priest and schoolmaster of Grand Pré, in Acadia (now called Nova Scotia) He accompanied Evangeline in part of her wanderings to find Gabriel her affianced husband. —Longfellow, Evangeline (1849)

Felicians (The), the happy nation The Felicians live under a free sovereignty, where the laws are absolute Felicia is the French "Utopia"—Mercier de la Rivière, L'Heureuse Nation (1767)

Feliciano de Sylva, don Quixote's favourite author The two following extracts were in his opinion unsurpassed and unsurpassable —

The reason most adored one of your unreasonable unreasonableness hath so unreasonably unreasoned my reason that I have no reasonable reason for reasoning against such unreasonableness.

The bright heaven of your dirtiness that lifts you to the stars, most celestial of women, renders you deserving of every desert which your charms so deservedly deserve —Cervantes, Don Quixote I. I. 8 (1605)

Felix, a monk who listened to the singing of a milk-white bird for a hundred years, which length of time seemed to him "but a single hour," so enchanted was he with the song —Longfellow, The Golden Legend (See THE BIRD)

Felix (Don), son of don Lopez He was a Portuguese nobleman, in love with Violante, but Violante's father, don Pedro, intended to make her a nun Donna Isabella, having fled from home to avoid a marriage disagreeable to her, took refuge with Violante, and when colonel Briton called at the house to see donna Isabella, her brother don Felix was jealous, believing that Violante was the object of his visits Violante kept "her friend's secret," even at the risk of losing her lover, but ultimately the mystery was cleared up, and a double marriage took place —Mrs Centlivre, The Wonder (1714)

Felix (M Minucius), a Roman lawyer, who flourished A.D. 280, he wrote a dialogue entitled Octavius, which occupies a conspicuous place among the early Apologies of Christianity

Like Minucius Felix she believed that evil demons hid themselves in the marbles (sculptures)—Ouida, Arcturion I. 2

Felixmar'te (4 syl) of Hyrcania, son of Flo'risan and Martedi'na, the hero of a Spanish romance of chivalry. The curate in Don Quixote condemned this work to the flames —Melchior de Orteza, Caballero de Ubeda (1566)

Fell (Dr) Tom Brown, being in disgrace, was set by Dr Fell, dean of Christ Church (1625-1686), to translate the thirty-third epigram of Martial

Non amo te Zabidi, nec possum dicere quare,
Hec tantum possum dicere non amo te

Which he rendered thus

I do not like thee Dr Fell—
The reason why I cannot tell
Put this I know and know full well,
I do not like thee Dr Fell.

Feltham (Black), a highwayman with captain Colepepper or Peppercull (the Alsatian bully) —Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Femmes Savantes (Les), women who go in for women's rights, science, and philosophy, to the neglect of domestic duties and wisely remembers The "blue-stockings" are (1) Philaminte (3 syl) the mother of Henriette, who discharges one of her servants because she speaks bad grammar, (2) Armande (2 syl) sister of Henriette, who advocates platonic love and science, and (3) Blaise sister of Philaminte, who sides with her in all things, but imagines that every one is in love with her Henriette, who has no sympathy with these "lofty flights," is in love with Clitandre, but Philaminte wants her to marry Trissotin, a bel esprit. However, the father loses his property through the "savant" proclivities of his wife, Trissotin retires, and Clitandre marries Henriette the "perfect" or thorough woman —Molière, Les Femmes Savantes (1672)

Fenella, alias Zarah (daughter of Edward Christian), a pretended deaf and dumb fairy-like attendant on the countess of Derby. The character seems to have been suggested by that of Mignon, the Italian girl in Goethe's Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship —Sir W Scott, Peer of the Peal (time, Charles II)

Let the idle beaux exult and I will appear as Fenella.
—Percy Fitzgerald Parvenu Family, III. 224.

Fenella, a deaf and dumb girl, sister or Masaniello the fisherman. She was seduced by Alfonso, son of the duke of Arcos, and Masaniello resolved to kill him. He accordingly headed an insurrection, and met with such great success that the mob made him chief magistrate of Portici, but afterwards shot him. Fenella, on hearing of her brother's death, threw herself into the crater or Vesuvius.—Auber, Masaniello (an opera, 1831)

Fenris, the demon wolf of Niflheim. When he gapes one jaw touches the earth and the other heaven. This monster will swallow up Odin at the day of doom. (Often but incorrectly written FENRIR).—Scandinavian Mythology

Fenton, the lover of Anne Page, daughter of Mr and Mrs Page, gentlefolks living at Windsor. Fenton is of good birth, and seeks to marry a fortune to "heal his poverty." In "sweet Anne Page" he soon discovers that which makes him love her for herself more than for her money.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, act iii sc 4 (1601)

Ferad-Artho, son of Carbre, and only surviving descendant of the line of Conar (the first king of Ireland). On the death of Cathmor (brother of the rebel Carbar) in battle, Ferad-Artho was placed by Fingal on the throne as "king of Ireland." The race was thus (1) Conar (a Caledonian), (2) Cormac I, his son, (3) Carbre, his son, (4) Artho, his son, (5) Cormac II, his son (a minor), (6) Ferad-Artho, his cousin.—Ossian, Lemora, vii

Fer'amorz, the young Cashmerian poet who relates poetical tales to Lalla Rookh on her journey from Delhi to Lesser Bucharin. Lalla is going to be married to the young sultan, but falls in love with the poet. On the wedding morn she is led to her bridegroom, and finds with unspeakable joy that the poet is the sultan himself.—J Moore, Lalla Rookh (1817)

Ferda, son of Dymman, chief of a hundred hills in Albion. Ferda was the friend of Cuthullin general of the Irish forces in the time of king Cormac I. Deugala (spouse of Carbar) loved the youth, and told her husband if he would not divide the herd she would no longer live with him. Cuthullin, being appointed to make the division, enraged the lady by assigning a snow-white bull to the husband, whereupon Deugala induced her lover to challenge Cuthullin to mortal combat. Most unwillingly the two friends fought, and Ferda fell. "The sunbeam of battle fell—the first of Cuthullin's friends. Unhappy [unlucky] is the hand of Cuthullin since the hero fell"—Ossian, Fingal, ii

Ferdinand, king of Navarre. He agreed with three young lords to spend three years in severe study, during which time no woman was to approach his court, but no sooner was the agreement made than he fell in love with the princess of France. In consequence of the death of her father, the lady deferred the marriage for twelve months and a day.

Ferdinand, a fiery young Spaniard, in love with Leonora.—Jephson, Two Strings to your Bow (1792)

Ferdinand (Don), the son of don Jerome of Seville, in love with Clara d'Almanza, daughter of don Guzman.—Sheridan, The Duenna (1773)

Ferdinand'o, a brave soldier who, having won the battle of Tari'fa, in 1340, was created count of Zamora and marquis of Montreal. The king, Alfonso XI, knowing his love for Leonora de Guzman, gave him the bride in marriage, but no sooner was this done than Ferdinando discovered that she was the king's mistress, so he at once repudiated her, restored his ranks and honours to the king, and retired to the monastery of St James de Compostella. Leonora entered the same monastery as a novice, obtained the pardon of Ferdinando, and died.—Donizetti, La Favorita (1842)

Fergus, fourth son of Fingal, and the only one that had issue at the death of his father. Ossian, the eldest brother, had a son named Oscar, but Oscar was slain at a feast by Carbar "lord of Atha," and of the other two brothers, Fillan was slain before he had married, and Ryno, though married, died without issue.

According to tradition, Fergus (son of Fingal) was the father of Congal, Congal of Areath, and Areath of Fergus II, with whom begins the real history of the Scots — Ossian

Fergus, son of Rossa, a brave hero in the army of Cuthullin general of the Irish tribes

Fergus first in our joy at the feast son of Po-sa arm of death — Ossian Fingal I.

Fer'qus is another form of Ferragus or Ferriente, 'the Portuguese giant' (See FERRACUTE)

Fern (Fanny), the pseudonym of Sarah Payson Willis, afterwards Eldredge, afterwards Farmington, afterwards Parton, sister of N P Willis, an American (1814-1872)

Fern (Will), a poor fellow who, being found asleep in a shed, is brought before alderman Cute. He says emphatically "he must be put down." The poor fellow takes charge of his brother's child, and is both honest and kind, but, alas! he dared to fall asleep in a shed, an offence which must be "put down." — C Dickens, The Chimes, third quarter (1841)

Fernan Caballero, the pseudonym of Cecilia Bohl de Faber, a Swiss novelist (1797-1877)

Fernando, son of John of Procida, and husband of Isoline (3 syl) daughter of the French governor of Messina. The butchery of the Sicilian Vespers occurred the night after their espousals. Fernando was among the slain, and Isoline died of a broken heart — S Knowles, John of Procida (1840)

Fernando (Don), youngest son of the duke Ricardo Gay, handsome, generous, and polite, but faithless to his friend Cardenio, for, contrary to the lady's inclination, and in violation of every principle of honour, he prevailed on Lucinda's father to break off the betrothal between his daughter and Cardenio and to bestow the lady on himself. On the wedding day Lucinda was in a swoon, and a letter informed the bridegroom that she was married already to Cardenio, she then left the house privately, and retired to a convent. Don Fernando, having entered the convent, carried her off, but stopping at an inn, found there Dorothea his wife, with Cardenio the husband of Lucinda, and the two parties paired off with their respective spouses — Cervantes, Don Quixote, I II (1605)

Fernan'do, a Venetian captain, servant to Annophel (daughter of the governor of Candy) — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Laws of Candy (1617)

Fernan'do [FLORESTAN], a State prisoner of Seville, married to Leonora, who (in boy's attire and under the name of Fidilio) became the servant of Rocco the jailer. Pizarro, governor of the jail, conceived a hatred to the State prisoner, and resolved to murder him, so Rocco and Leonora were sent to dig his grave. The arrival of the minister of state put an end to the infamous design, and Fernando was set at liberty — Beethoven, Fidilio (1791)

Fernoy (The Patriarch of), Voltaire, so called because he lived in retirement at Ferney, near Geneva (1691-1778).

Ferquhard Day, the absentee from the clan Chattan at the combat — Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Fer'acute, a giant who had the strength of forty men, and was thirty-six feet high. He was slain by Orlando, who wounded him in the navel, his only vulnerable part — Turpin, Chronicle of Charlemagne

 Ferriente is the prototype of Pulci's "Morgante," in his heroic-comic poem entitled Morgante Maggore (1491)

Fer'ragus, the Portuguese giant, who took Belshazzar under his care after his divorce from Alexander emperor of Constantinople — Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century).

My elbow tall form lent grace the part Of Fergus. — or Acanth.

Sir W. Scott

Fer'ramond (Sir), a knight, whose lady-love was Lucia.

Ferrand de Vaudemont (Count), duc de Lorraine, son of René king of Provence. He first appears disguised as Laurence Neipperg — Sir W. Scott, Annals of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Ferrardo [Gonzaga], reigning duke of Mantua in the absence of his cousin Leonardo. He was a villain, and tried to prove Marana (the bride of Leonardo) guilty of adultery. His scheme was this. He made Julian St Pierre drunk with drugged wine, and in his sleep conveyed him to the duke's bed, throwing his scarf under the bed of the duchess, which was in an adjoining chamber. He then revealed these proofs of guilt to his cousin Leonardo, but Leonardo refused to believe in his wife's guilt, and Julian St Pierre exposed the whole scheme of villainy, amply vindicating the innocence of Mariana, who turned out to be Julian's sister — S Knowles, The Wife (1833)

Ferrau, a Saracen, son of Landfu'sa. Having dropped his helmet in a river, he vowed never to wear another till he won that worn by Orlando. Orlando slew him by a wound in the navel, his only vulnerable part — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Ferraugh (Sir), introduced in bk iii 8, but without a name, as carrying off the false Florimel from Braggadoocio. In bk iv 2, the name is given. He is there overthrown by sir Blandamour, who takes away with him the false Florimel, the lady of snow and wax — Spenser, Faëry Queen (1590, 1596)

Ferret, an avaricious, mean-spirited slanderer, who blasts by innuendoes, and blights by hints and cautions. He hates young Heartall, and misinterprets all his generous acts, attributing his benevolence to hush-money. The rascal is at last found out and foiled — Cherry, The Soldier's Daughter (1804)

Ferrex, eldest son of Gorboduc, a legendary king of Britain. Being driven by his brother Porrex from the kingdom, he returned with a large army, but was defeated and slain by Porrex — Gorboduc, a tragedy by Thom Norton and Thom Sackville (1561)

Fetnab ("tormentor of hearts"), the favourite of the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid. While the caliph was absent in his wars, Zobeide (3 syl), the caliph's wife, out of jealousy, ordered Fetnab to be buried alive. Ganem happened accidentally to see the internment, rescued her, and took her home to his own private lodgings in Bagdad. The caliph, on his return, demanded for Fetnab as dead, but receiving from her a letter of explanation, he became jealous of Ganem, and ordered him to be put to death. Ganem, however, contrived to escape. When the fit of jealousy was over, the caliph heard the facts plainly stated, whereupon he released Fetnab, gave her in marriage to Ganem, and appointed the young man to a very lucrative post about the court — Arabian Nights ("Ganem, the Slave of Love")

Fe'zon, daughter of Savary duke of Aquitaine. The Green Knight, who was a pagan, demanded her in marriage, but Orson (brother of Valentine), called "The Wild Man of the Forest," overthrew the pagan and married Fezon — Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century)

Fiammetta, a lady beloved by Boecicio, supposed to be Maria, daughter of Robert king of Naples. (See LOVERS) (Italian, fiamma, "a little flame")

Fib, an attendant on queen Mab — Drayton, Nymphidia

Fiction Father of Modern Prose Fiction, Daniel Defoe (1663-1731)

Fiddler (Oliver's) Sir Roger l'Estrange was so called, because at one time he was playing a fiddle or viol in the house of John Hingston, where Cromwell was one of the guests (1616-1704)

Fiddler Joss, Mr Joseph Poole, a reformed drunkard, who subsequently turned preacher in London, but retained his former sobriquet

Fiddler's Green, the Elysium of sailors, a land flowing with rum and limejuice, a land of perpetual music, mirth, dancing, drinking, and tobacco, a sort of Dixie's Land or land of the leal

Fidele (3 syl), the name assumed by Imogen, when, attired in boy's clothes, she started for Milford Haven to meet her husband Posthumus — Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605)

* * * Collins has a beautiful elegy on "Fidele"

Fidelia, "the foundling." She is in reality Harriet, the daughter of sir Charles Raymond, but her mother dying in childbirth, she was committed to the charge of a governanthe. The governanthe sold the child, at the age of 12, to one Villard, and then wrote to sir Charles to say that she was dead. One night, Charles Belmont, passing by, heard cries of distress, and going to the rescue took the girl home as a companion to his sister. He fell in love with her, the governanthe, on her death-bed, told the story of her infamy, and Charles married the foundling — Ed Moore, The Foundling (1748)

Fidelio, Leonora, wife of Fernando Florestan. She assumed the name of Fidelio, and dressed in male attire when her husband was a State prisoner, that she might enter the service of Rocco the jailer, and hold intercourse with her husband — Beethoven, Fidelio (1791)

Fides (2 syl), mother of John of Leyden. Believing that the prophet-ruler of Westphalia had caused her son's death, she went to Munster to curse him. Seeing the ruler pass, she recognized in him her own son, but the son pretended not to know his mother, and Fides, to save him annoyance, professed to have made a mistake. She was put into a dungeon, where John visited her, and when he set fire to his palace, Fides rushed into the flames, and both perished together — Meyerbeer, Le Prophète (1849)

Fidessa, the companion of Sansfoy, but when the Red Cross Knight slew that "faithless Saracen," Fidessa told him she was the only daughter of an emperor of Italy, that she was betrothed to a rich and wise king, and that her betrothed being slain, she had set forth to find the body, in order that she might decently inter it. She said that in her wanderings Sansfoy had met her and compelled her to be his companion, but she thanked the knight for having come to her rescue. The Red Cross Knight, wholly deluded by this plausible tale, assured Fidessa of his sympathy and protection, but she turned out to be Duessa, the daughter of Falsehood and Shame. The sequel must be sought under the word Durss. — Spenser, Fairy Queen, 1 2 (1590)

Fido, Faith personified, the foster-son of Aedü ("hearing," Rom x 17), his foster-sister is Meditation. Fully described in canto ix of The Purple Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher (Latin, fides, "faith")

Field of Blood, Acedrama, the plot of land purchased by the thirty pieces of silver which Judas had received of the high priest, and which he threw down in the Temple when he saw that Jesus was condemned to death — Matt. xxvii 5

Field of Blood, the battle-field of Cannæ, where Hannibal, B.C. 216, defeated the Romans with very great slaughter

Field of Mourning, a battle-field near the city of Aragon. The battle was fought July 17, 1184, between the Christians and the Moors

Field of Peterloo, the site of an attack made by the military upon a reform meeting held in St Peter's Field, Manchester, August 16, 1819. As many as 60,000 persons were wounded in this absurd attack. The word is a burlesque on Waterloo

Battles and bloodshed, September massacres, bridges of Lodi, retreats of Moscow, Waterloos, Peterloos, ten pound franchises, tar barrels, and guillotines. — Carlyle

Field of the Cloth of Gold, a large plain between Ardres and Guisnes [Gheeu], where François I. interviewed Henry VIII in 1520

They differ as a May-day procession of chimney sweepers differs from The Field of the Cloth of Gold. — Macaulay

Field of the Forty Footsteps, at the back of the British Museum, once called Southampton Fields. The tradition is that two brothers, in the Monmouth rebellion, took different sides, and engaged each other in fight. Both were killed, and forty impressions of their feet were traceable in the field for years afterwards

* * The Misses Porter wrote a novel called The Field of the Forty Footsteps, and the Messrs Mayhew took the same subject for a melodrama.

Fielding (Mrs), a little querulous old lady with a peevish face, who, in consequence of having once been better off, or of labouring under the impression that she might have been if something in the indigo trade had happened differently, was very genteel and patronizing indeed. When she dressed for a party, she wore gloves, and a cap of state "almost as tall and quite as stiff as a mitre"

May Fielding, her daughter, very pretty and innocent. She was engaged to Edward Plummer, but heard that he had died in South America, and consented to marry Tackleton the toy merchant. A few days before the day fixed for the wedding, Edward Plummer returned, and they were married. Tackleton gave them as a present the cake he had ordered for his own wedding feast — C. Dickens, The Cricket on the Hearth (1816)

Fielding of the Drama, George Farquhar, author of The Beaux' Stratagem, etc (1678-1707).

Fielding's Proverbs. These were in reality compiled by W. Henry Ireland, the Shakespeare impostor, who published Miscellaneous Papers and Instruments, under the hand and seal of William Shakespeare, including the tragedy of King Lear and a small fragment of Hamlet, from the original, 1796, folio, £4 4s The whole a barefaced forgery

Fierabras (Sir) [Fe ā' i a brah], a Saracen of Spain, who made himself master of Rome, and carried away the crown of thorns and the balsam with which the Lord had been embalmed His chief exploit was to slay the giant who guarded the bridge of Mantible, which had thirty arches, all of black marble Bal'and of Spain assumed the name of sir Fierabras

Balsam of Fierabras, the balsam used in embalming the body of Christ, stolen by sir Fierabras It possessed such virtues that one single drop, taken internally, sufficed to heal the most malignant wound

Fierabras of Alexandria, the giant son of admiral Baland, of Spain He possessed all Babylon, even to the Red Sea, was seigneur of Russia, lord of Cologne, master of Jerusalem, and of the Holy Sepulchre This huge giant ended his days in the odour of sanctity, "meek as a lamb, and humble as he was meek" on these two comedies e.g. Mozart's Nozze di Figaro (1786), Paisiello's Il Barbiere di Siviglia (1810), Rossini's Il Barbiere di Siviglia (1816)

Fig'aro, the sweetheart of Susan (fav'ourite waiting-woman of the countess Almaviva) Figaro is never so happy as when he has two or three plots in hand — T Holcroft, The Follics of a Day (1745-1809)

Fights and Runs Away (He that)

He that fights and runs away
May live to fight another day,
But he that is in battle slain
Can never rise to fight again.
Sir John Mennis, Musarion Delicta (1646)

* * Demosthenês, being reproached for running away from the battle of Chæronêa, replied, αὐτὸς οὐ φεύγων καὶ πάλιν μαχησεται ("a man who runs away may fight again")

Those that fly may fight again
Which he can never do that's slain
S. Butler Hudibras III 3 (1678)

Fighting Prelate (The), Henry Spencer, bishop of Norwich He opposed the rebels under Wat Tyler with the temporal sword, absolved them, and then sent them to the gibbet In 1383 he went to assist the burghers of Ghent in their contest with the count of Flanders

The bishop of Norwich the famous Fighting Prelate had led an army into Flanders.—Lord Campbell.

Filch, a lad brought up as a pick-pocket Mrs Peachum says, "He hath as fine a hand at picking a pocket as a woman, and is as nimble-fingered as a juggler If an unlucky session does not cut the rope of thy life, I pronounce, boy, thou wilt be a great man in history" (act i 1) — Gay, The Beggar's Opera (1727)

Fil'a Dolorosa, the duchesse d'Angoulême, daughter of Louis XVI Also called "The Modern Antigone" (1778-1851)

Filio-que, the following knotty point of theological controversy between the Eastern and Western Churches — Does the Holy Ghost proceed from the Father and the Son (filio-que), or from the Father only Of course, in the Nicene Creed in the Book of Common Prayer, the question is settled so far as the Church of England is concerned

Fillan, son of Fingal and Clatho, the most highly finished character in the poem of Temora. Fillan was younger than his nephew Oscar, and does not appear on the scene till after Oscar's death. He is rash and fiery, eager for military glory, and brave as a lion. When Fingal appointed Gaul to command for the day, Fillan had hoped his father's choice might have fallen to his own lot. "On his spear stood the son of Clatho . . . thrice he raised his eyes to Fingal, his voice thrice failed him as he spoke. He strode away, bent over a distant stream, the tear hung in his eye. He struck at times the thistle's head with his inverted spear." Yet showed he no jealousy, for when Gaul was in danger, he risked his own life to save him. Next day was Fillan's turn to lead, and his deeds were unrivalled in dash and brilliancy. He slew Foldath, the general of the opposing army, but when Cathmor "lord of Atha," the commander-in-chief, came against him, Fillan fell. His modesty was then as prominent as his bravery. "Lay me," he said to Ossian, "in that hollow rock. Ruise no stone above me. I am fallen in the first of my fields, fallen without renown." Every incident of Fillan's life is beautiful in the extreme—Ossian, Temora, v.

Fillpot (Toby), a thirsty old soul, who "among jolly toppers bore off the bell." It chanced as in dog-days he sat boozing in his arbour, that he died "full as big as a Dorchester butt." His body turned to clay, and out of the clay a brown jug was made, sacred to friendship, mirth, and mild ale.

His body when long in the ground it had lain
And time into clay had resolved it again
A potter found out in its covert so snug,
And with part of fat Toby he formed this brown jug,
Now sacred to friendship to mirth and mild ale.
So here's to my lovely sweet Nan of the vale.

Rev. Francis Hawker (1721-1777)

 The two best drinking songs in the language were both by clergymen. The other is, I Cannot Eat but Little Meat, by John Still, bishop of Bath and Wells (1543-1607).

Filomena (Santa). At Pisa the church of San Francisco contains a chapel lately dedicated to Santa Filomena. Over the altar is a picture by Sanbatelli, which represents Filomena as a nymph-like figure floating down from heaven, attended by two angels bearing the lily, the palm, and a javelin. In the foreground are the sick and maimed, healed by her intercession.

Nor ever shall be wanting here
The palm, the lily, and the spear
The symbols that of yore
St. Filomena bore.

 In Grimm's Goblins is the same fairy tale ("Fortunio").

Fin'etor, a necromancer, father of the Enchantress Damsel.—Vaseo de Lobera, Amadis de Gaul (thirteenth century).

Finetta, "the cinder girl," a fairy tale by the Comtesse D'Aunoy (1682). This is merely the old tale of Cinderella slightly altered. Finetta was the youngest of three princesses, despised by them, and put to all sorts of menial work. The two sisters went to balls, and left Finetta at home in charge of the house. One day she found a large gold key, which opened a wardrobe full of most excellent dresses, so, arraying herself in one, she followed her sisters to the ball, but she was so fine that they knew her not, and she ran home before them. This occurred two or three times, but at last, in running home, she lost one of her slippers. The young prince resolved to marry her alone whose foot fitted the slipper, and Finetta became his wife. Finetta was also called Auricula or "Fine-ear."

Fingal (or Fion na Gael)

His father was Comhal or Combal, and his mother Morna.

(Comhal was the son of Trallian king of Morven, and Morna was the daughter of Thaddu.)

His first wife was Roserana, mother of Ossian. His second was Clatho, mother of Fillan, etc.

(Roserana was the daughter of Cormac I third king of Ireland)

His daughter was Bosmu'na, and his sons Ossian, Fillan, Ryno, and Fergus (The son of Ossian was Oscar)

(Fillan was younger than his nephew Oscar, and both, together with Ryno, were slain in battle before Fingal died)

His bard and herald was Ullin His sword Luno, so called from its maker, Luno of Loehlin (Denmark)

His kingdom was Morven (the north-west coast of Scotland), his capital Semo, his subjects were Caledonians or Gaels

After the restoration of Ferad-Artho to the throne of Ireland, Fingal "resigned his spear to Ossian," and he died A D 288

Fingal, an epic in six books, by Ossian The subject is the invasion of Ireland by Swaran king of Loehlin (Denmark) during the reign of Cormac II (a minor), and its deliverance by the aid of Fingal king of Morven (north-west coast of Scotland) The poem opens with the overthrow of Cuthullin general of the Irish forces, and concludes with the return of Swaran to his own land

Finger "Little finger tell me true" When M Argan wishes to pump his little daughter Louison, respecting a young gentleman who pays attentions to her elder sister, he says to the child, "Prenez-y bien garde au moins, car voilà un petit doigt, qui sait tout, qui me dira si vous mentez" When the child has told him all she knows, he puts his little finger to his ear and says, "Voilà mon petit doigt pourtant qui gronde quelque chose Attendez Hé! Ah, ah! Oui? Oh, oh! voilà mon petit doigt, qui me dit quelque chose que vous avez vu et que vous ne n'avez pas dit" To which the child replies, "Ah! mon papa, votre petit doigt est un menteur" —Molière, Le Malade Imaginaire, ii 11 (1673)

Fionnuala, daughter of Lir Being transformed into a swan, she was doomed to wander over the lakes and rivers of Ireland till the Irish became Christians, but the sound of the first mass bell in the island was to be the signal of her release

Silent, O Moyle be the roar of thy water [County Tyrone]
While murmuring mournfully Lir's lonely daughter
Tells to the night-star her tale of woe.
When shall the Swan her death note sing,
Sleep with wings in darkness furled?
When will heaven its sweet bell ringing
Call my spirit from this stormy world?

Fir-bolg (i.e. bowmen, from bolg, "a quiver"), a colony of Belgæ from Britain, led by Lathion to Ireland and settled in the southern parts of the island Their chief was called "lord of Atha" (a country of Connaught), and thence Ireland was called Bolga Somewhat later a colony of Caledonians from the western coast of Scotland settled in the northern parts of Ireland, and made Ulster their head-quarters When Crotha was "lord of Atha" he carried off Conlun (daughter of the Cael chief) by force and a general war between the two races ensued. The Cael were reduced to the last extremity, and sent to Trathal (grandfather of Fingal) for aid. Trathal accordingly sent over Conar with an army, and on his reaching Ulster he was made "king of the Cael" by acclamation. He utterly subdued the Fir-bolg, and assumed the title of "king of Ireland," but the Fir-bolg often rose in insurrection, and made many attempts to expel the race of Conar—Ossian.

John duke of Bedford styled 'The Fire brand of France'
Drayton Polyolbion xviii. (1613)

Fire-drake, a fire which flies in the night, like a dragon. Metaphorically it means a spittfire, an irritable, passionate person.

Common people think the fire-drake to be a spirit that keepeth some hid treasure but philosophers affirm it to be a great unequal exhalation inflamed between two clouds, the one hot and the other cold which is the reason that it smoketh. The middle part being greater than the rest, maketh it seeme like a beelie and the two ends are like unto a head and taile.—Bullokar Expositor (1610).

Firouz Schah, son and heir of the king of Persia. One New Year's Day an Indian brought to the king an enchanted horse, which would convey the rider almost instantaneously anywhere he might wish to go to, and asked, as the price thereof, the king's daughter for his wife. Prince Firouz, mounting the horse to try it, was carried to Bengal, and there fell in love with the princess, who accompanied him back to Persia on the horse. When the king saw his son arrive safe and sound, he dismissed the Indian discourteously, but the Indian caught up the princess, and, mounting the horse, conveyed her to Cashmere. She was rescued by the sultan of Cashmere, who cut off the Indian's head, and proposed marriage himself to the princess. To avoid this alliance, the princess pretended to be mad. The sultan sent for his physicians, but they could suggest no cure. At length came one who promised to cure the lady, it was prince Firouz in disguise.

He told the sultan that the princess had contracted enchantment from the horse, and must be set on it to disenchant her. Accordingly, she was set on the horse, and while Firouz caused a thick cloud of smoke to arise, he mounted with the lady through the air, saying as he did so, "Sultan of Cashmere, when you would espouse a princess who craves your protection, first learn to obtain her consent"—Arabian Nights ("The Enchanted Horse").

First Love, a comedy by Richard Cumberland (1796). Frederick Mowbray's first love, being dowierless, marries the wealthy lord Ruby, who soon dies, leaving all his fortune to his widow. In the mean time, Frederick goes abroad, and at Padua falls in with Sabina Rosny, who nurses him through a severe sickness, for which he thinks he is bound in honour to marry her. She comes with him to England, and is placed under the charge of lady Ruby. Sabina tells lady Ruby she cannot marry Frederick, because she is married already to lord Sensitive, and even if it were not so, she could not marry him, for all his affections are with lady Ruby, thus she discovered in the delirium of the young man, when his whole talk was about her ladyship. In the end, lord Sensitive avows himself the husband of Sabina, and Frederick marries his first love.

I do profess to serve him truly that will put me in trust and to eat no fish.—Shakespeare King Lear act i. sc. 4 (1663)

Fish and the Ring

1 Polycrates, being too fortunate, was advised to cast away something he most highly prized, and threw into the sea an engraved gem of great value. A few days afterwards a fish came to his table, and in it was this very gem.—Herodotus, in 40

2 A certain queen, having formed an illicit attachment to a soldier, gave him a ring which had been the present of her husband. The king, being apprized thereof, got possession of the ring while the soldier was asleep, threw it into the sea, and then asked his queen to bring it him. In great alarm, she went to St Kentigern and told him everything. The saint went to the Clyde, caught a salmon with the ring in its mouth, and gave it to the queen, who thus saved her character and her husband. This legend is told about the Glasgow arms.

3 The arms of dame Rebecca Berry, wife of sir Thomas Elton, Stratford-le-Bow, to be seen at St Dunstan's Church, Stepney. The tale is that a knight, hearing the cries of a woman in labour, knew that the infant was destined to become his wife. He tried to elude his destiny, and, when the infant had grown to womanhood, threw a ring into the sea, commanding the damsel never to see his face again till she could produce the ring which he had cast away. In a few days a cod-fish was caught, and the ring was found in its mouth. The young woman producing the ring, the marriage was duly consummated.—Romance of London

Fitz-Pulke (Hebe duchess of), a "gracious, graceful, graceless grace" (canto xvi 49), staying with lord and lady Amundeville (4 syl), while don Juan "the Pussim envoy" was their guest. Don Juan fancied he saw in the night the apparition of a monk, which produced such an effect on his looks and behaviour as to excite attention. When the cause of his perturbation was known, lady Adeline sang to him a tale purporting to explain the apparition, but "her frolic grace" at night personated the ghost to carry on the joke. She was, however, discovered by don Juan, who was resolved to penetrate the mystery. With this discovery the sixteenth and last book of Don Juan ends.—Byron, Don Juan (1824)

Five, says Pythagoras, "has peculiar force in expiations. It is everything. It stops the power of poisons, and is redoubted by evil spirits. Unity or the monad is deity, or the first cause of all things—the good principle. Two or the dyad is the symbol of diversity—the evil principle. Three or the triad contains the mystery of mysteries, for everything is composed of three substances. It represents God, the soul of the world, and the spirit of man. Five is 2+3, or the combination of the first of the equals and the first of the unequals, hence also the combination of the good and evil powers of nature"—Pythagoras, On the Pentad

Five Points of Doctrine (The)
(1) Predestination or particular election,
(2) Irresistible grace, (3) Original sin or the total depravity of the natural man,
(4) Particular redemption, and (5) The final perseverance of the saints. The Calvinists believe the affirmative of all these five points.

Five-pound Note. De Quincy tried in vain to raise the loan of half a crown on the security of a five-pound note.

Five Wits (The) common wit, imagination, fantasy, estimation, and memory.

1 Common wit is that inward sense which judges what the five senses simply discern: thus the eye sees, the nose smells, the ear hears, and so on, but it is "common wit" that informs the brain and passes judgment on the goodness or badness of these external matters.

2 Imagination works on the mind, causing it to realize what has been presented to it.

3. Fantasy energizes the mind to act in accordance with the judgment thus pronounced.

4. Estimation decides on all matters pertaining to time, space, locality, relation, and so on

5. Memory enables the mind to retain the recollection of what has been imparted

 Shakespeare got this name from bishop Harsnett's Declaration of Popish Impostures, where Flibbertigibbet is one of the fiends which the Jesuits cast out of Mr Edmund Peckham

Flibbertigibbet or "Dickie Sludge," the dwarf grandson of Gimmer Sludge (landlady of Erasmus Holiday, the schoolmaster in the vale of Whitehorse) In the entertainment given by the earl of Leicester to queen Elizabeth, Dickon Sludge acts the part of an imp—Sir W Scott, Kennilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Flint (Lord), chief minister of state to one of the sultans of India He had the enviable faculty of a very short memory when he did not choose to recollect "My people know, no doubt, but I cannot recollect," was his stock phrase—Mrs Inchbald, Such Things Are (1786)

Flint, jailer in The Deserter, a musical drama by Dibdin (1770)

Flint (Sir Clement), a very kind-hearted, generous old bachelor, who "trusts no one," and though he professes his undoubted belief to be "that self is the predominant principle of the human mind," is never so happy as when doing an unselfish and generous act He settles £2000 a year on the young lord Gayville, his nephew, that he may marry Miss Alton, the lady of this choice, and says, "To reward the deserving, and make those we love happy, is self-interest in the extreme"—General Burgoyne, The Heiress (1781)

Flint Jack, Edward Simpson, who used to tramp the kingdom, vending spurious flint arrow-heads, celts, and other imitation antiquities In 1867 he was imprisoned for theft

Flippant'a, an intriguing lady's-maid Daughter of Mrs Cloggit She is in the service of Clarissa, and aids her in all her follies—Sir John Vanbrugh, The Confederacy (1695)

I saw Miss Pope for the second time in the year 1799 in the character of "Flippant'a."—James Smith.

Flite (Miss), a poor crazed, good-hearted woman, who has lost her wits through the "law's delay" She is always haunting the Courts of Chancery with "her documents," hoping against hope that she will receive a judgment.—C Dickens, Black House, iv (1852).

Flock'hart (Widow), landlady of the lodgings in the Canongate where Waverley and M'lor dine with the baron of Bradwardine (3 syl)—Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Flogged by Deputy The marquis de Leganez forbade the tutor of his son to use rigour or corporal punishment of any kind, so the tutor hit upon this device to intimidate the boy he flogged a lad named Raphael, brought up with young Leganez as a playmate, whenever that young nobleman deserved punishment This produced an excellent effect, but Raphael did not see its justice, and ran away—Lesage, Gil Blas, i i (1724)

Floilo or Floillio, a Roman tribune, who held the province of Gaul under the emperor Leo When king Arthur invaded Gaul, the tribune fled to Paris, which Arthur besieged, and Floilo proposed to decide the quarrel by single combat To this Arthur agreed, and cleft with his sword Calburn both the helmet and head of his adversary Having made himself master of all Gaul, king Arthur held his court at Paris—Geoffrey, British History, ix 11 (1142)

And after these
At Paris in the lists [Arthur] with Floillio fought
The emperor Leon's power to raise his seat that brought Dryden Polyolion iv (1611.)

Flor and Blanche-flor, the title of a minnesong by Conrad Fleck, at one time immensely popular It is the story of two children who fall in love with each other There is a good deal of grace and tenderness in the tale, with an abundance of trash Flor, the son of Feinix, a pagan king, is brought up with Blanche-flor (an enfant riche) The two children love each other, but Feinix sells Blanche-flor to some Eastern merchants Flor goes in quest of Blanche-flor, whom he finds in Babylon, in the palace of the sultan, who is a sorcerer He gains access to the palace, hidden in a basket of roses, but the sultan discovers him, and is about to cast both into the flames, when, touched with human gentleness and love, he sets them free They then return to Spain, find Feinix dead, and marry (fourteenth century)

Flo'ra, goddess of flowers In natural history all the flowers and vegetable productions of a country or locality are called its flora, and all its animal productions its fauna

Flora, the waiting-woman of donna Violante In love with Lissado, the valet of don Felix—Mrs Centlivre, The Wonder (1714)

Mrs Matlocks was the most affecting theatrical leave taking we ever witnessed. The part she chose was Flora, to Cook's don Felix which she played with all the freshness and spirit of a woman in her prime—The New Monthly (1825)

Flora, the niece of old Farmer Freehold She is a great beauty, and captivates Heartwell, who marries her. The two are so well assorted that their "best love is after their espousals"—John Philip Kemble, The Farm-house

Floranthe (Donna), a lady beloved by Octavian. Octavian goes mad because he fancies Floranthê is untrue to him, but Roque, a blunt, kind-hearted servant, assures him he is mistaken, and persuades him to return home—G Colman, Octavian (1824)

Flor'delice (3 syl), the mistress of Bran'dimart (king of the Distant Islands)—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Flordespina, daughter of Mar-siglio—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Florence, Mrs Spencer Smith, daughter of baron Herbert the Austrian ambassador in England. She was born at Constantinople, during her father's residence in that city. Byron made her acquaintance in Malta, but Thomas Moore thinks his devotion was more imaginary than real. In a letter to his mother, his lordship says he "finds her [Florence] very pretty, very accomplished, and extremely eccentric"

Thou mayst find a new Calypso there
Sweet Florence could another ever share
This wayward loveless heart, it would be thine
Byron Childe Harold II. 30 (1810)

Florence (The German), Dresden, also called "The Florence of the North"

Florent or Florentius, a knight who promised to marry a deformed and ugly hag, who taught him the solution of a riddle—Gower, Confessio Amantis, 1 (1393)

"The Wife of Bath's Tale," in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, is the same story. The ugly old hag becomes converted into a beautiful young princess, and "Florent" is called "one of Arthur's knights" (1388)

Florentine Diamond (The), the fourth largest cut diamond in the world

It weighs 139½ carats, and was the largest diamond belonging to Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy. It was picked up by a Swiss peasant, who sold it to a priest for half a crown. The priest sold it for £200, to Bartholomew May of Berne. It subsequently came into the hands of pope Julius II, and the pope gave it to the emperor of Austria. (See DIAMONDS)

Flores or ISLE OF FLOWERS, one of the Azores (2 syl). It was discovered in 1439 by Vanderberg, and is especially celebrated because it was near this isle that sir Richard Grenville, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, fought his famous sea-fight. He had only one ship with a hundred men, and was opposed by the Spanish fleet of fifty-three men-of-war. For some hours victory was doubtful, and when sir Richard was severely wounded, he wanted to sink the ship, but the Spaniards boarded it, complimented him on his heroic conduct, and he died. As the ship (The Revenge) was on its way to Spain, it was wrecked, and went to the bottom, so it never reached Spain after all. Tennyson has a poem on the subject (1878)

Flo'es (2 syl), the lover of Blanchefleur—Boccaccio, Il Filosepo (1340)

* * Boccaccio has repeated the tale in his Decameron, x. 5 (1352), in which Flores is called "Ansaldo," and Blanchefleur "Diano'ra." Flores and Blanchefleur, before Boccaccio's time, were noted lovers, and are mentioned as early as 1288 by Mattres Ly mengau de Beziers, in his Breman d'Amor

Chaucer has taken the same story as the basis of the Fiancelin's Tale, and Bojardo has introduced it as an episode in his Orlando Innamorato, where the lover is "Prasildo" and the lady "Tisbina" (See PRASILDO)

Flores'ki (Count), a Pole, in love with princess Lodoiska (4 syl). At the opening of the play he is travelling with his servant Varbel to discover where the princess has been placed by her father during the war. He falls in with the Tartar chief Kera Khan, whom he overpowers in fight, but spares his life, and thus makes him his friend. Flores'ki finds the princess in the castle of baron Lovinski, who keeps her a virtual prisoner, but the castle being stormed by the lartars, the baron is slain, and the princess marries the count—J P Kemble, Lodovska

Florez, son of Gerrard king of the beggars. He assumes the name of Goswin, and becomes, in Bruges, a wealthy merchant. His mistress is Bertha, the supposed daughter of Vandunke the burgomaster—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Beggars Bush (1622)

Flor'ian, "the foundling of the forest," discovered in infancy by the count De Valmont, and adopted as his own son. Florian is light-hearted and volatile, but with deep affection, very brave, and the delight of all who know him. He is betrothed to his cousin, Lady Geraldine, a ward of count De Valmont—W Dimond, The Foundling of the Forest

Florimel "the Fair," courted by sir Satyrane, sir Peridure, and sir Calidore (each 3 syl), but she herself "loved none but Marinel," who cared not for her. When Marinel was overthrown by Britomart and was reported to be dead, Florimel resolved to search into the truth of this rumour. In her wanderings, she came weary to the hut of a hag, but when she left the hut the hag sent a savage monster to bring her back. Florimel, however, jumped into a boat and escaped, but fell into the hands of Proteus (2 syl), who kept her in a dungeon "deep in the bottom of a huge great rock." One day, Marinel and his mother went to a banquet given by Proteus to the sea-gods, and as Marinel was loitering about, he heard the captive bemoaning her hard fate, and all "for love of Marinel." His heart was touched, he resolved to release the prisoner, and obtained from his mother a warrant of release, signed by Neptune himself. Proteus did not dare to disobey, the lady was released, and became the happy bride of her liberator—Spenser, Fairy Queen, in 4, 8, and iv 11, 12 (1590, 1596)

* * * The name Florimel means "honey-flower."

Florinel (The False), made by a witch of Rhiphean snow and virgin wax, with an infusion of vermilion. Two burning lamps in silver sockets served for eyes, fine gold wire for locks, and for soul "a sprite that had fallen from heaven." Braggadocio, seeing this false Florimel, carried "her" off as the veritable Florimel, but when he was stripped of his borrowed plumes, this waxen Florimel vanished into thin air, leaving nothing behind except the "golden girdle that was about her waist"—Spenser, Fairy Queen, in 8, and v 3 (1590, 1596)

Florimel's Girdle, a girdle which gave to those who wore it, "the virtue of chaste love and wifehood true," if any woman not chaste or faithful put it on, it immediately "loosed or tore asunder." It was once the cestus of Venus, but when that queen of beauty wanted with Mars, it fell off and was left on the "Aedonian mount"—Spenser, Fairy Queen, iv 2 (1596)

One day, sir Cambel, sir Triamond, sir Paridel, sir Blandamour, and sir Terramont agreed to give Florimel's girdle to the most beautiful lady, when the previous question was moved, "Who was the most beautiful?" Of course, each knight, as in duty bound, adjudged his own lady to be the paragon of women, till the witch's image of snow and wax, made to represent Florimel, was produced, when all agreed that it was without a peer, and so the girdle was handed to "the false Florimel." On trying it on, however, it would in no wise fit her, and when by dint of pins it was at length fastened, it instantly loosened and fell to the ground. It would fit Amoret exactly, and of course Florimel, but not the witch's thing of snow and wax—Spenser, Fairy Queen, iv 5 (1596)

* * * Morgan la Fée sent king Arthur a horn, out of which no lady could drink "who was not to herself or to her husband true." Ariosto's enchanted cup possessed a similar spell.

A boy showed king Arthur a mantle which no wife not lady could wear. If any unchaste wife or maiden put it on, it would either go to shreds or refuse to drape decorously.

At Ephesus was a grotto containing a statue of Diana. If a chaste wife or maiden entered, a reed there (presented by Pan) gave forth most melodious sounds, but if the unfaithful or unchaste entered, its sounds were harsh and discordant.

Alasnam's mirror remained unsullied when it reflected the unsullied, but became dull when the unchaste stood before it. (See CARADOC, p 160)

Florinda, daughter of count Julian one of the high lords in the Gothic court of Spain. She was violated by king Roderick, and the count, in his indignation, renounced the Christian religion and called over the Moors, who came to Spain in large numbers and drove Roderick from the throne. Orpas, the renegade archbishop of Seville, asked Florinda to become his bride, but she shuddered at the thought. Roderick, in the guise of a priest, reclaimed count Julian as he was dying, and as Florinda rose from the dead body.

Her cheek was flushed and in her eyes there beamed
A wilder brightness. On the Goth [Roderick] she gazed While underneath the emotions of that hour Exhausted life gave way. Round his neck she threw
Her arms and cried "My Pederick mine in heaven!"
Groining he clasped her close and in that act
And agony her happy spirit fled.

Southey, Roderick etc. xlv. (1814)

Flo'ripes (3 syl.), sister of sir Fierabras [Le a'ia brab], daughter of Laban, and wife of Guy the nephew of Charlemagne.

Florisan'do (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series of Le Roman des Romans, or those pertaining to Amadis of Gaul. This part (from bk vi to xiv) was added by Paez de Ribera.

Floise (The lady), attendant on queen Berengaria—Sir W Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I).

Flor'isel of Nice'a (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series called Le Roman des Romans, pertaining to Amadis of Gaul. This part was added by Leluciano de Silva.

Flor'ismart, one of Charlemagne's paladins, and the bosom friend of Roland.

Florival (Mdlle.), daughter of a French physician in Belleisle. She fell in love with major Belford, while nursing him in her father's house during a period of sickness. Her marriage, however, was deferred, from the great aversion of the major's father to the French, and he went to Havannah. In due time he returned to England and colonel Tamper with him. Now, colonel Tamper was in love with Emily, and, wishing to try the strength of her affection, pretended to be severely mutilated in the wars. Florival was a guest of Emily at the time, and, being apprised of the trick, resolved to turn the tables on the colonel, so when he entered the room as a maimed soldier, he found there Florival, dressed as an officer, and, under the name of captain Johnson, flirting most desperately with Emily. The colonel was mad with jealousy, but in the very whirlwind of his rage, major Belford recognized Mdlle Florival, saw through the trick, and after a hearty good laugh at the colonel, all ended happily—Colman, sen, The Deuce is in Ivan (1762).

Flor'izel, son of Polixenês king of Bohemia. In a hunting expedition, he saw Perdita (the supposed daughter of a shepherd), fell in love with her, and courted her under the assumed name of Doriclês. The king tracked his son to the shepherd's house, and told Perdita that if she gave countenance to this foolery he would order her and the shepherd to be put to death. Florizel and Perdita then fled from Bohemia, and took refuge in Sicily. Being brought to the court of king Leontês, it soon became manifest that Perdita was the king's daughter. Polixenês, in the mean time, had tracked his son to Sicily, but when he was informed that Perdita was the king's daughter, his objection to the marriage ceased, and Perdita became the happy bride of prince Florizel—Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale (1604).

Florizel, the name assumed by George IV in his correspondence with Mrs Robinson (actress and poetess), generally known as Per'dita, that being the character in which she first attracted his attention when prince of Wales.

* * George IV was generally nicknamed "prince Florizel."

Flower of Chivalry, sir William Douglas, knight of Liddesdale (*-1553). Sir Philip Sidney, statesman, poet, and soldier, was also called "The Flower of Chivalry" (1554-1586). So was the Chevalier de Bayard, le Chevalier sans Peur et sans Reproche (1476-1524).

Flower of Kings. Arthur is so called by John of Exeter (sixth century).

Flower of Poets, Geoffrey Chaucer (1328-1400).

Flower of the Levant. Zantê is so called from its great beauty and fertility.

Zante! Zante! flor di Levant!

Flower of Yarrow (The), Mary Scott, daughter of sir William Scott of Harden.

Flowers (Lovers') are stated by Spenser, in his Shepherd's Calendar, to be "the purple columbine, gillflowers, carnations, and sops in wine" ("April").

In the "language of flowers," columbine signifies "folly," gillflowers "bonds of love," carnations "pure love," and sops of wine (one of the carnation family)

"woman's love"

Bring hither the pinkie, and purple columbine

With gilliflowers

Bring coronations and sops in wine

Worne of paramours.

Spenser The Shepheardes Calendar (April 1579)

Flower Sermon, a sermon preached every Whit Monday in St Catherine Cree. On this occasion each of the congregation carries a bunch of flowers, and a bunch of flowers is also laid on the pulpit cushion. The Flower Sermon is not now limited to St Catherine Cree, other churches have adopted the custom.

Flowerdale (Sir John), father of Clarissa, and the neighbour of colonel Oldboy. —Bickerstaff, Lionel and Clarissa

Flowered Robes. In ancient Greece to say "a woman wore flowered robes" was the same as to say she was a fille publique. Solon made it a law that virtuous women should appear in simple and modest apparel, but that harlots should always dress in gay and flowered robes.

As fugitive slaves are known by their stigmata, so flowered garments indicate one of the deni monde (Coixia lida). —Clement of Alexandria.

Flowery Kingdom (The), China. The Chinese call their kingdom Luca Kicoh, which means "The Flowery Kingdom," i.e. the flower of kingdoms.

Fluel'len, a Welsh captain and great pedant, who, amongst other learned quiddities, drew this parallel between Henry V and Alexander the Great: "One was born in Monmouth and the other in Mucedon, both which places began with M, and in both a river flowed." —Shakespeare, Henry V act iv sc 7 (1599)

Flur, the bride of Cassivelann, "for whose love the Roman Caesar first invaded Britain." —Tennyson, Idylls of the King ("Enid")

Flute (The Magic), a flute which has the power of inspiring love. When given by the powers of darkness, the love it inspires is sensual love, but when bestowed by the powers of light, it becomes subservient to the very holiest ends. In the opera called Die Zauberflöte, Tamino and Pamina are guided by it through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of divine truth (or the mysteries of Isis). —Mozart, Die Zauberflöte (1791)

Flutter, a gossip, fond of telling a good story, but, unhappily, unable to do so without a blunder. "A good-natured, insignificant creature, admitted everywhere, but cared for nowhere" (act 1 3). —Mrs Cowley, The Belle's Stratagem (1780)

Fly-gods, Beelzebub, a god of the Philistines, supposed to ward off flies. Achor was worshipped by the Syrians for a similar object. Zeus Apomyios was the fly-god of the Greeks.

On the east side of your shop aloft,

Write Nathlail Tarnael and Baraborat

Upon the north part, Rael Vael Thiel

They are the names of those m. recurlal sprites

That do fight flies from boxes.

B Johnson The Alchemist I. (1610)

Flying Dutchman (The), a phantom ship, seen in stormy weather off the Cape of Good Hope, and thought to forebode ill luck. The legend is that it was a vessel laden with precious metal, but a horrible murder having been committed on board, the plague broke out among the crew, and no port would allow the ship to enter, so it was doomed to float about like a ghost, and never to enjoy rest. —Sir W Scott.

* * Another legend is that a Dutch captain, homeward bound, met with long-continued head winds off the Cape, but swore he would double the Cape and not put back, if he strove till the day of doom. He was taken at his word, and there he still beats, but never succeeds in rounding the point.

(Captain Marryat has a novel founded on this legend, called The Phantom Ship, 1836.)

Flying Highwayman, William Harrow, who leaped his horse over turnpike gates as if it had been furnished with wings. He was executed in 1763.

Flyter (Mrs), landlady of the lodgings occupied by Frank Osbaldistone in Glasgow. —Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I.)

Foible, the intriguing lady's-maid of lady Wishfort, and married to Waitwell (lackey of Edward Mirabell). She interlards her remarks with "says he," "he says says he," "she says says she," etc. —W Congreve, The Way of the World (1700)

Foi'gard (Father), one of a gang of thieves. He pretends to be a French priest, but "his French shows him to be English, and his English shows him to be Irish." —Farquhar, The Beaux' Stratagem (1705)

Folair' (2 syl), a pantomimist at the Portsmouth Theatre, under the management of Mr Vincent Crummies—C. Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Foldath, general of the Fir-bolg or Belgæ in the south of Ireland. In the epic called Temora, Cathmor is the "lord of Atha," and Foldath is his general. He is a good specimen of the savage chieftain bold and daring, but presumptuous, overbearing, and cruel. "His stride is haughty, and his red eye rolls in wrath." He looks with scorn on Hidalla, a humane and gentle officer in the same army, for his delight is strife, and he exults over the fallen. In counsel Foldath is imperious, and contemptuous to those who differ from him. Unrelenting in revenge, and even when he falls with his death-wound, dealt by Fillan the son of Fingal, he feels a sort of pleasure that his ghost would hover in the blast, and exult over the graves of his enemies. Foldath had one child, a daughter, the blue-eyed Dardn-Le'na, the last of the race.—Ossian, Temora

Follies of a Day, a comedy by Holcroft (1715-1809)

Fon'dlewife, an uxorious banker—Congreve, The Old Bachelor (1693)

When Mrs Jefferson (1733-1763) was asked in what characters she excelled the most, she innocently replied, "In old men like Fondlewife and sir Jealous Traffic."
—T. Davies.

* * "Sir Jealous Traffic" is in The Lusty Body, by Mrs Centlivre

Fondlove (Sir William), a vain old baronet of 60, who fancies himself a schoolboy, capable of playing boyish games, dancing, or doing anything that young men do. "How marvellously I wear! What signs of age have I? I'm certainly a wonder for my age. I walk as well as ever. Do I stoop? Observe the hollow of my back. As now I stand, so stood I when a child, a rosy, chubby boy. My arm is firm as 'twas at 20. Oak, oak, isn't it? Think you my leg is shrunk?—not in the calf a little? When others waste, 'tis growing-time with me. Vigour, sir, vigour, in every joint. Could run, could leap. Why shouldn't I marry?" So thought sir William of sir William, and he married the Widow Green, a buxom dame of 40 summers.—S. Knowles, The Love-Chase (1837)

Fontanebleau (Deerce of), an edict passed by Napoleon I, ordering all English goods wherever found to be ruthlessly burnt (October 18, 1810)

Fontarabia, now called Fuenterabia (in Latin Fons rapidus), near the gulf of Gascony. Here Charlemagno and all his chivalry fell by the sword of the "Spanish Saracens"—Mariana

* * Mezeray says that the rear of the king's army being cut off, Charlemagno returned and obtained a brilliant revenge

Fool. James I of Great Britain was called by Sully of France, "The Most Learned Fool in Christendom" (1566-1625)

Fool (The), in the ancient morris-dance, represented the court jester. He carried in his hand a yellow bauble, and wore on his head a hood with ass's ears, the top of the hood rising into the form of a cock's neck and head, with a belt at the extreme end. The hood was blue edged with yellow and scalloped, the doublet red edged with yellow, the girdle yellow, the hose of one leg yellow and of the other blue, shoes red. (See MORRIS-DANCE)

Fools Pays de Fous Ghcel, in Belgium, is so called, because it has been for many years the Bedlam of Belgium

Battersen is also a pays de fous, from a pun. Simples used to be grown there largely for the London apothecaries, and hence the expression, You must go to Battersen to get your simples cut

* * Bæotia was considered by the Athenians the pays de fous of Greece. Arcadia was also a folly-land, hence Arcades ambo ("both noodles alike")

Fools, Jesters, and Mirthmen. Those in italics were mirthmen, but not licensed fools or jesters

ADRIANUS (Lurid Kaspar), jester to George I. He was not only a fun-maker, but also a ghostly adviser of the Hanoverian

AKSAKOFF, the fool of czarina Elizabeth of Russia (mother of Peter II). He was a stolid brute, fond of practical jokes

ANGELI (L), jester to Louis XIV, and last of the licensed fools of France. He is mentioned by Boileau in Satires I and VIII

AORI (Monsignore), who succeeded Soglia as the merry man of pope Gregory XVI

ARMISTONG (Archie), jester in the courts of James I and Charles I. One of the characters in Scott's novel The Fortunes of Nigel. Being condemned to death by King James for sheep-stealing, Archie implored that he might live till he had read his Bible through for his soul's weal. This was granted, and Archie rejoined, with a sly look, "Then de il tak' me 'gin I ever read a word on't!"

BLADIC, "joculator" to William the Conqueror. Three towns and five carucates in Gloucestershire were given him by the king.

BLURT D'ARBREES (seventeenth century), fool to the duke of Mantua. During a pestilence, he conceived the idea of offering his life as a ransom for his countrymen, and actually starved himself to death to stay the plague.

BOVYR (Patrick), jester to the regent Morton.

BORDE (Andrew), usually called "Merry Andrew," physician to Henry VIII (1500-1549).

BRUSQUET. Of this court fool Brantôme says "He never had his equal in repartee" (1512-1563).

CAILLET (Guillaume), who flourished about 1490. His likeness is given in the frontispiece of the Ship of Fools (1197).

CINCOR, jester of Henri III and Henri IV. Alexandre Dumas has a novel called Chicot the Jester (1553-1591).

COLQUHOUN (Jemmy), predecessor of James Geddes, jester in the court of Mary queen of Scots.

CORYAT, "prince of non-official jesters and coxcombs." Kept by prince Henry, brother of Charles I.

COULOV, doctor and jester to Louis XVIII. He was the very prince of mimes. He sat for the portraits of Thiers, Molé, and comte Joseph de Villèle (died 1858).

DA'GOVFT (Sir), jester to king Arthur. He was knighted by the king himself.

DEPRIE, a court jester to James I. Contemporary with Thom.

DUNESVOY, poet, playwright, actor, gardener, glass-manufacturer, spend-thrift, wit, and honorary fool to Louis XIV. His jests are the "Joe Millers" of France.

GEDDES (James), jester in the court of Mary queen of Scots. He was daft, and followed Jemmy Colquhoun in the motley.

GIORNUX (Le), jester of Charles le Hardi of Burgundy.

GOVELLA, domestic jester of the duke of Ferrara. His jests are in print.

Fopling Flutter (Sir), "the man of mode," and chief character of a comedy by sir George Etherege, entitled The Man of Mode or Sir Fopling Flutter (1676)

Fopperry Vespasian the Roman emperor had a contempt for fopperry When certain young noblemen came to him smelling of perfumes, he said to them, "You would have pleased me more if you had smelt of garlic"

Charlemagne had a similar contempt of fopperry One day, when he was hunting, the run poured down in torrents, and the fine furs and silks of his suite were utterly spoilt The king took this occasion to rebuke the court beaux for their vanity in dress, and advised them in future to adopt garments more simple and more serviceable

Foppington (Lord), an empty-headed coxcomb, intent only on dress and fashion His favourite oaths, which he brings out with a drawl, are "Strid o me dumb!" "Split my windpipe!" and so on When he loses his mistress, he consoles himself with this reflection "Now, for my part, I think the wisest thing a man can do with an aching heart is to put on a serene countenance, for a philosophical air is the most becoming thing in the world to the face of a person of quality"—Sir John Vanbrugh, The Relapse (1697)

The shoemaker in The Relapse tells Lord Foppington that his lordship is mistaken in supposing that his shoe pinches.—Macaulay

Foppington (Lord), a young married man about town, most intent upon dress and fashion, whose whole life is consumed in the follies of play and seduction His favourite oaths are "Sun, burn me!" "Curse, catch me!" "Stap my breath!" "Let me blood!" "Run me through!" "Strike me stupid!" "Knock me down!" He is reckoned the king of all court fops—Colley Cibber, The Careless Husband (1704)

MacKlin says Nature formed Colley Cibber for a coxcomb and his predominant tendency was to be considered among men as a leader of fashion and among women as a beau parson Hence his lord Foppington was a model for dress, and that hunter and nonchalant which distinguished the superior coxcombs of that day—Percy Anecdotes

Foppington (Lord), elder brother of Tom Fashion A selfish coxcomb, engaged to be married to Miss Hoyden, daughter of sir Tunbells Clumsy, to whom he is personally unknown His brother Tom, to whom he did not behave well, resolved to outwit him, and passing himself off as lord Foppington, got introduced to the family, and married the heiress When his lordship appeared, he was treated as an impostor, till Tom explained his ruse, and sir Tunbells, being snubbed by the coxcomb, was soon brought to acquiesce in the change, and gave his hand to his new son-in-law with cordiality The favourite oaths of lord Foppington are "Strike me dumb!" "Strike me ugly!" "Stap my vitals!" "Split my windpipe!" "Kut me!" etc, and, in speaking, his affectation is to change the vowel "o" into a, as rat, naw, icsahic, waurid, ardered, masth, paund, maunth, lang, philasapher, tarture, and so on.—Shendan, A Trip to Scarborough (1777)

* * This comedy is The Relapse, slightly altered and curtailed

Ford, a gentleman of fortune living at Windsor. He assumes the name of Brook and being introduced to sir John Falstaff, the knight informs him "of his whole course of wooing," and how at one time he eluded Mrs Ford's jealous husband by being carried out before his eyes in a buck-basket of dirty linen—Act iii sc 5

Mrs Ford, wife of Mr Ford. Sir John Falstaff pays court to her, and she pretends to accept his protestations of love, in order to expose and punish him. Her husband assumes for the nonce the name of Brook, and sir John tells him from time to time the progress of his suit, and how he succeeds in duping her fool of a husband.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor (1596)

Fordelias (3 syl), wife of Brindimart (Orlando's intimate friend). When Brindimart was slain, Fordelias dwelt for a time in his sepulchre in Sicily, and died broken-hearted (See ORLANDO)—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso, lib. xii (1516).

Forehead. A high forehead was at one time deemed a mark of beauty in women, hence Falce, the wife of Guy of Warwick, is described as having "the same high forehead as Venus"—History of Guy of Warwick

Fore'sight (2 syl), a mad, superstitious old man who "consulted the stars, and believed in omens, portents, and predictions." He referred "mar's goatish disposition to the charge of a star," and says he himself was "born when the Crab was ascending, so that all his affairs in life have gone backward."

I know the stars, and the planets, and their houses can best of motions direct, and retrograde of scyllen, quaternary, and other long, fiery wheels, and aquatic origins. Know whether life shall be long or short, by perceiving, which direction are to be the end of it. If I judge shall be prosperous, undertake, I will, and if not, I will be reserved.—Shakespeare's Love for Love lib. ii.

Forester (Sir Philip), a libertine knight. He goes in disguise to lady Bothwell's ball on his return from the Continent, but, being recognized, decamps.

Lady Jemima Forester, wife of sir Philip, who goes with her sister lady Bothwell to consult "the enchanted mirror," in which they discover the clandestine marriage and infidelity of sir Philip—Sir W. Scott, Aunt Margaret's Mirror (time, William III.)

Forgeries (Literary).

BITHAM (C. Julius), professor of English at Copenhagen, professed to have discovered, in 1717, the De Situ Britanniarum of Richardus Corinensis, in the library of that city. See p 321, SCRIPTORUM TITLS

Add to these the abbe VIII & History of Scilly, come, etc., the Byron, Keats, and Shelley forgeries, etc

CHATTERTON (Thos), in 1777, published certain poems which he affirmed were written in the fifteenth century by Thomas Powley, a monk. The poets Gray and Maon detected the forgery.

His other literary forgeries were (1) The Pedigree of Brunan (a Bristol painter), professed to have been discovered in the muniment-room of St. Mary's Church, Redcliffe. He accordingly printed a history of the "De Bergham" family, with a poem called The Romance of St. Omphre, by John de Bergham (fourteenth century). (2) A forged account of the opening of the old bridge, signed "Durhelmus Bristolensis," and professing to have been copied from an old MS. (3) An Account of Bristol, by Turgotus, "translated out of Saxon into English, by J. Powley." This forgery was made for the use of Mr. Catcott, who was writing a history of Bristol.

IFLAND (S. W. H.) published, in folio, 1796, Miscellaneous Papers and Fragments, under the hand and seal of William Shakespeare, containing the tragedy of King Lear and a small fragment of Hamlet, from the original, price £4 10. He actually produced MSS which he had forged, and which he pretended were original.

On April 2, 1796, the play of Fortinbrun and Hamlet, "from the pen of Shakespeare," was announced for representation. It drew a most crowded house, but the fraud was detected, and Ireland made a public declaration of his impositions, from beginning to end.

MILNITZ, who lived in the ninth century, published fifty-nine decretals, which he asserted were by Isidore of Seville, who lived three centuries previously. The object of these forged letters was to exalt the papacy and to corroborate certain dogmas.

At Bremen, in 1837, were printed nine books of SACHSONIATRON, and it was said that the MSS had been discovered in the convent of St Maria de Merinhão, by a colonel Pereira in the Portuguese army, but it was ascertained that there was no such convent, nor any such colonel and that the paper of this "ancient" MS bore the water-mark of Osnabrück paper-mills

Forget-me-nots of the Angels
So Longfellow calls the stars

Silently one by one in the infinite meadows of heaven
Blossomed the lovely stars, the forget me nots of the angels.

Fortune of Love, in ten books, by Antonio Lofrasco, a Sardinian poet

'By my holy office,' cried the curé 'since Apollo was Apollo and the Muses were the offspring of Jove there never was a better or more delightful volume. He who has never read it has missed a fund of entertainment. Give it me Mr Nicholas I would rather have that book than a casock of the very best Florence silk.' — Cervantes Don Quixote l l c (1605)

Fortune's Frolic, a farce by Allingham Lord Lackwit died suddenly, and the heir of his title and estates was Robin Roughhead, a poor labourer, engaged to Dolly, a cottager's daughter The object of the farce is to show the pleasure of doing good, and the blessings which a little liberality can dispense Robin was not spoiled by his good fortune, but married Dolly, and became the good genius of the cottage tenantry

Fortunes of Nigel, a novel by sir W Scott (1822) This story gives an excellent picture of the times of James I, and the account of Alsatia is wholly unrivalled The character of King James, poor, proud, and pedantic, is a masterly historic sketch

Fortunio, one of the three daughters of an old lord, who at the age of four score was called out to join the army levied against the emperor of Matapa Fortunio put on military costume, and went in place of her father On her way, a fairy gave her a horse named Comrade, not only of incredible swiftness, but all-knowing, and endowed with human speech, she also gave her an inexhaustible Turkey-leather trunk, full of money, jewels, and fine clothes By the advice of Comrade, she hired seven gifted servants, named Strongback, Lightfoot, Marksman, Pinc-ear, Boisterer, Trinet, and Grurgeon After performing several marvellous feats by the aid of her horse and servants, Fortunio married Alfarito (3 syl.) the king of her country —Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales (1682)

* * The tale is reproduced in Grimm's Goblins

- Fortunio's Horse, Comrade, which not only possessed incredible speed, but knew all things, and was gifted with human speech

Fortunio's Attendants

Trinque drank up the lutes and pord, and thus caught for his master (sic) most delicate fish. Lightfoot hunted down venison, and caught larks by the ears. As for Markman, he gave neither partridge nor pheasant any quarter, and whatever amount of game Markman shot Struckback would carry without inconvenient notice.—Comtesse D'Aunoy Fairy Tales (Fortunio, 1682).

Fortunio's Sisters Whatever gifts Fortunio sent her sisters, their touch rendered them immediately worthless. Thus the coffers of jewels and gold, "became only cut glass and false pistoles" the moment the jealous sisters touched them

Fortunio's Turkey-leather Trunk, full of suits of all sorts, swords, jewels and gold. The fairy told Fortunio "she needed but to stamp with her foot, and call for the Turkey-leather trunk, and it would always come to her, full of money and jewels, fine linen and laces"—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales (1682)

Forty Thieves, also called the tale of "Ali Baba." These thieves lived in a vast cave, the door of which opened and shut at the words, "Open, Sesame!" "Shut, Sesame!" One day, Ali Baba, a wood-monger, accidentally discovered the secret, and made himself rich by carrying off gold from the stolen hoards. The captain tried several schemes to discover the thief, but was always outwitted by Morgiana, the wood-cutter's female slave, who, with boiling oil, killed the whole band, and at length stabbed the captain himself with his own dagger —Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba or the Forty Thieves")

Foundling (The) Harriet Raymond, whose mother died in childbirth, was committed to the charge of a gouvernante, who announced to her father (sir Charles Raymond) that the child was dead. This, however, was not true, for the gouvernante changed the child's name to Fidelia, and sold her at the age of 12 to one Vilhard. One night, Charles Belmont, passing Vilhard's house, heard the cries of a girl for help, he rescued her and took her to his own home, where he gave her in charge to his sister Rosetta. The two girls became companions and friends, and Charles fell in love with the "foundling." The gouvernante, on her death-bed, revealed the secret to sir Charles Raymond, the mystery was cleared up, and Fidelia became the wife of Charles Belmont. Rosetta gave her hand to Fidelia's brother, colonel Raymond — Edward Moore, The Foundling (1748)

Fourberies de Scapin (Les), by Molière (1671). Scapin is the valet of Léandre, son of seignior Geronc (2 syl) who falls in love with Zerbiette, supposed to be a gipsy, but in reality the daughter of seignior Argante (2 syl), stolen by the gipsies in early childhood. Her brother Octave (2 syl) falls in love with Hyacinthe, whom he supposes to be Hyacinthe Pandolphe of Tarentum, but who turns out to be Hyacinthe Geronc, the sister of Léandre. Now, the gipsies demand £1500 as the ransom of Zerbiette, and Octave requires £80 for his marriage with Hyacinthe. Scapin obtains both these sums from the fathers under false pretences, and at the end of the comedy is brought in on a litter, with his head bound as if on the point of death. He begs forgiveness, which he readily obtains, whereupon the "sick man" jumps from the litter to join the banqueters. (See SCAPIN)

Fourde'is, personification of France, called the true love of Burbon (Henri IV), but enticed away from him by Grantorto (rebelle). Fraud, seen by Dantë between the sixth and seventh circles of the Inferno

His head and upper part exposed on land
But hid not on the shore his bestial train.
His face the semblance of a just man's wore
(So kind and gracious was its outward cheer)
The rest was serpent all Two shaggy claws
Reached to the armpits, and the back and breast
And either side were painted o'er with nodes
And orbits.

Dantë Zell, xvii. (1390)

Freckles Cured "The entrails of crocodiles," says Ovid, "are excellent to take freckles or spots from the face and to whiten the skin" As Pharos, an island in the mouth of the Nile, abounded in crocodiles, the poet advises those who are swarthy and freckled to use the Pharian wash

If swarthy to the Pharian varnish fly

Friars The four great religious orders were Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustines, and Carmelites (2 syl). Dominicans are called black friars, Franciscans gray friars, and the other two white friars A fifth order was the Trinitarians or Crutched friars, a later foundation The Dominicans were furthermore called Fratres Majores, and the Franciscans Fratres Minores

(For friars famed in fable or story, see under each respective name or pseudonym)

Friar's Tale (The), by Chaucer, in The Canterbury Tales (1388). An archdeacon employed a sumpnour as his secret spy to find out offenders, with the view of exacting fines from them. In order to accomplish this more effectually, the sumpnour entered into a compact with the devil, disguised as a woman. Those who imprecated the devil were to be dealt with by the woman-devil, and those who imprecated God were to be the sumpnour's share. They came in time to an old woman "of whom they knew no wrong," and demanded twelve pence "for cursing." She pleaded poverty, when the sumpnour exclaimed, "The foul fiend fetch me if I excuse thee!" and immediately the foul fiend at his side did seize him, and made off with him too.

Fribble, a contemptible molly-coddle, troubled with weak nerves. He "speaks like a lady for all the world, and never swears." He wears nice white gloves, and tells his lady-love what ribbons become her complexion, where to stick her patches, who is the best milliner, where they sell the best tea, what is the best wash for the face, and the best paste for the hands. He is always playing with his lady's fan, and showing his teeth." He says when he is married.

And he said, "Now I shall be out of sight,
So over the valley and over the height
In silence I'll take my way"

Miss Gould.

Froth (Master), a foolish gentleman. Too shallow for great crime and too light for virtue—Shakespeare, Measure for Measure (1603)

Froth (Lord), a good boon companion, but he vows that "he laughs at nobody's jests but his own or a lady's." He says, "Nothing is more unbecoming a man of quality than a laugh," 'tis such a vulgar expression of the passion, every one can laugh." To lady Froth he is most gallant and obsequious, though her fidelity to her liege lord is by no means immaculate

Lady Froth, a lady of letters, who writes songs, elegies, satires, lampoons, plays, and so on. She thinks her lord the most polished of all men, and his bow the pattern of grace and elegance. She writes an heroic poem called The Syl-labub, the subject of which is lord Froth's love to herself. In this poem she calls her lord "Spnmoso" (Froth), and herself "Biddy" (her own name). Her conduct with Mr Brisk is most blameable—W Congreve, The Double Dealer (1700)

Frothal, king of Sorn, and son of Annir. Being driven by tempest to Sarno, one of the Orkney Islands, he was hospitably entertained by the king, and fell in love with Comala, daughter of Starno king of Instore or the Orkney. He would have carried her off by violence, but her brother Cathulla interfered, bound Frothal, and, after keeping him in bonds for three days, sent him out of the island. When Starno was gathered to his fathers, Frothal returned and laid siege to the palace of Cathulla, but Fingal, happening to arrive at the island, met Frothal in single combat, overthrew him, and would have slain him, if Utha his betrothed (disguised in armour) had not interposed. When Fingal knew that Utha was Frothal's sweetheart, he not only spared the foe, but invited both to the palace, where they passed the night in banquet and song—Ossian, Carric-Thura

Gabriel (2 or 3 syl), according to Milton, is called "chief of the angelic guards" (Paradise Lost, iv 519), but in l. vi 41, etc., Michael is said to be "of celestial armies prince," and Gabriel "in military prowess next"

Go, Michael, of celestial armies prince

And thou, Gabriel, my prowess next

Go thou forth to battle these my sons

lvi 12

Mich. on Paradise Lost vi 41 et seq.

*. Gabriel is also called "The Messenger of the Messiah," because he was sent by the Messiah to execute his orders on the earth. He is referred to in

Daniel xiii 16, ix 21, and in Luke i 19, 26

Gabriel (according to the Korân and Sale's notes)

1 It is from this angel that Mahomet professes to have received the Korân, and he acts the part of the Holy Ghost in causing believers to receive the divine revelation — Ch. ii

2 It was the angel Gabriel that won the battle of Bedr. Mahomet's forces were 319, and the enemy's a thousand, but Gabriel (1) told Mahomet to throw a handful of dust in the air, and on so doing the eyes of the enemy were "confounded," (2) he caused the army of Mahomet to appear twice as many as the army opposed to it, (3) he brought from heaven 3000 angels, and, mounted on his horse Hazzûm, led them against the foe — Ch. iii

3 Gabriel appeared twice to Mahomet in his angelic form first "in the highest part of the horizon," and next "by the lote tree" on the right hand of the throne of God — Ch. iv

4 Gabriel's horse is called Hazzûn, and when the golden calf was made, a little of the dust from under this horse's feet being thrown into its mouth, the calf began to low, and received life — Ch. v

Gabriel (according to other legends)

The Persians call Gabriel "the angel of revelations," because he is so frequently employed by God to carry His messages to man

The Jews call Gabriel their enemy, and the messenger of wrath, but Michael they call their friend, and the messenger of all good tidings

In mediæval romance, Gabriel is the second of the seven spirits which stand before the throne of God, and he is frequently employed to carry the prayers of man to heaven, or bring the messages of God to man

Longfellow, in the Golden Legend makes Gabriel "the angel of the moon," and says that he "brings to man the gift of hope"

Gabriel Lajcunnesse, son of Basil the blacksmith of Grand Pré, in Acadia (now Nova Scotia). He was legally plighted to Evan, Jane, daughter of Benedict Bellefontaine (the richest farmer of the village), but next day all the inhabitants were exiled by order of George II, and their property confiscated. Gabriel was parted from his betrothed wife, and Evan, Jane spent her whole life in trying to find him. After many wanderings, she went to Pennsylvania, and became a sister of mercy. The plague visited this city, and in the almshouse the sister saw an old man stricken down by the pestilence. It was Gabriel. He tried to whisper her name, but died in the attempt. He was buried, and Evangeline lies beside him in the grave.—Longfellow, Evangeline (1849)

Gabrielle (Charmante), or La Belle Gabrielle, daughter of Antoine d'Estrees (grand-master of artillery and governor of the Ile de France). Henri IV (1599) happened to stay for the night at the chateau de Couvres, and fell in love with Gabrielle, then 19 years old. To throw a veil over his intrigue, he gave her in marriage to Damerval de Liancourt, created her duchess of Beaufort, and took her to live with him at court.

The song, beginning "Charmante Gabrielle" is ascribed to Henri IV.

Gabrina, wife of Argeo's baron of Serina, tried to seduce Philander, a Dutch knight, but Philander fled from the house where he was a guest. She then accused him to her husband of a wanton insult, and Argeo, having apprehended him, confined him in a dungeon. One day, Gabrina visited him there, and implored him to save her from a knight who sought to dishonour her. Philander willingly espoused her cause, and slew the knight, who proved to be her husband. Gabrina then told her champion that if he refused to marry her, she would accuse him of murder to the magistrates. On this threat he married her, but ere long was killed by poison. Gabrina now wandered about the country as an old hag, and being fastened on Odorico, was hung by him to the branch of an elm.—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516).

Gabrieletta, governess of Brittany, rescued by Amadis de Gaul from the hands of Brian ("the bravest and strongest of all giants").—Vasco de Lobera, Amadis de Gaul, iv. 129 (fourteenth century).

Gadshill, a companion of sir John Falstaff. This thief receives his name from a place called Gadshill, on the Kentish road, notorious for the many robberies committed there.—Shakespeare, 1 Henry IV act ii sc 4 (1597).

Gahevis (Sir), son of Lot (king of Orkney) and Morgause (king Arthur's sister). Being taken captive by sir Turquoise, he was liberated by sir Launcelot du Lac. One night, sir Ghevis caught his mother in adultery with Lamorake, and, holding her by the hair, struck off her head.

Alas! said sir Lamorake, why have you slain your own mother? With more right should ye have slain me.

And when it was known that sir Ghevis had slain his mother, king Arthur was passing wrath, and commanded him to leave his court.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, li. 179 (1470).

Gaiour (Djou'ur), emperor of China, and father of Badour'a (the "most beautiful woman ever seen upon earth"). Badoura married Camaralzaman, the most beautiful of men.—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura"). (See GRIOT.)

Galahad (Sir), the chaste son of sir Launcelot and the fair Elaine (king Pelles's daughter, pt iii 2), and thus was fulfilled a prophecy that she should become the mother of the noblest knight that was ever born. Queen Guenever says that sir Launcelot "came of the eighth degree from our Saviour, and sir Galahad is of the ninth, and, therefore, be they the greatest gentlemen of all the world" (pt iii 35). His sword was that which sir Balin released from the maiden's scabbard (see BALIN), and his shield belonged to king Luelin [Lielin], who received it from Joseph of Arimathy. It was a snow-white shield, on which Joseph had made a cross with his blood (pt iii 39). After divers adventures, sir Galahad came to Sarra's, where he was made king, was shown the sanguinal by Joseph of Arimathy, and even "took the Lord's body between his hands," and died. Then suddenly "a great multitude of angels bear his soul up to heaven," and "since he was never no man that could say he had seen the sangreal" (pt iii 103).

Sir Galahad was the only knight who could sit in the "Siege Perilous," a seat in the Round Table reserved for the knight destined to achieve the quest of the holy grail, and no other person could sit in it without peril of his life (pt iii 32). He also drew from the iron and marble rock the sword which no other knight could release (pt iii 3). His great achievement was that of the holy grail. Whatever other persons may say of this mysterious subject, it is quite certain that the Arthurian legends mean that sir Galahad saw with his bodily eyes and touched with his hands "the incarnate Saviour," reproduced by the consecration of the elements of bread and wine. Other persons see the transformation by the eye of faith only, but sir Galahad saw it bodily with his eyes.

Then the bishop took a wafer which was made in the likeness of bread, and at the lifting up [the elevation of the host] there came a figure in the likeness of a child and the visage was as red and as bright as fire, and he they saw that the bread then he put it into the bishop's took the holy vessel and came to sir Galahad as he kneeled down, and there he received his Saviour, then went he and kissed sir Bors, and kneeled at the table and made his prayers, and suddenly his soul departed, and a great multitude of angels bear his soul to heaven.—Sir T. Malory History of Prince Arthur III. 101-103 (1470)

* * Sir Galahalt, the son of sir Brewnor, must not be confounded with sir Galahad, the son of sir Lancelot.

Galahalt (Sir), called "The Haut Prince," son of sir Brewnor. He was one of the knights of the Round Table.

* * This knight must not be confounded with sir Galahad, the son of sir Lancelot and Elaine (daughter of king Pellās).

Gal'antyse (3 syl), the steed given to Grande Amoure by king Melyzyus.

And I my self shall give you a worthy steed.
Called Galantysse to helpe you in your neede.
Stephen Hawes, The Pastime of Pleasure xviii (1575)

Ga'laor (Don), brother of Amadis of Gaul. A desultor amoris, who, as don Quixote says, "made love to every pretty girl he met." His adventures form a strong contrast to those of his more serious brother—Amadis of Gaul (fourteenth century).

A barber in the village insisted that none equalled 'The Knight of the Sun' [i.e. Amadis], except don Galhor his brother.—Cervantes, Don Quixote I. I. 1 (1605).

Gal'apas, a giant of "marvellous height" in the army of Lucius king of Rome. He was slain by king Arthur.

[King Arthur] slew a great giant named Galapas. He shortened him by smiting off both his legs at the knees, saying, "Now art thou better of a size to deal with than thou wert." And after he smote off his head.—Sir T. Malory History of Prince Arthur I. 115 (1470).

Galeotti Martivalle (Martius), astrologer of Louis XI. Being asked by the superstitious king if he knew the day of his own death, the crafty astrologer replied that he could not name the exact day, but he had learnt thus much by his art—that it would occur just twenty-four hours before the decease of his majesty (ch. xxiv.)—Sir W. Scott, Quentin Duward (time, Edward IV.).

Galera'na is called by Ariosto the wife of Charlemagne, but the nine wives of that emperor are usually given as Hamiltrude (3 syl), Desider'na, Hil'de-garde (3 syl), Fastrude (2 syl), Iuit-garde, Maltegarde, Gersuinde, Regi'na, Galère (2 syl) — Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère? Scapin wants to get from Geronte (a miserly old hunk) £30, to help Leandre, the old man's son, out of a money difficulty. So Scapin ramps up a cock-and-bull story about Leandre being invited by a Turk on board his galley, where he was treated to a most sumptuous repast, but when the young man was about to quit the galley, the Turk told him he was a prisoner, and demanded £30 for his ransom within two hours' time. When Geronte hears this, he exclaims, "Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?" and he swears he will arrest the Turk for extortion. Being shown the impossibility of so doing, he again exclaims, "Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?" and it flashes into his mind that Scapin should give himself up as surety for the payment of the ransom. Thus, of course, Scapin objects to. The old man again exclaims, "Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?" and commands Scapin to go and tell the Turk that £30 is not to be picked off a hedge. Scapin says the Turk does not care a straw about that, and insists on the ransom. "Mais, que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?" cries the old hunk, and tells Scapin to go and pawn certain goods. Scapin replies there is no time, the two hours are nearly exhausted. "Que diable," cries the old man again, "allait-il faire dans cette galère?" and when at last he gives the money, he repeats the same words, "Mais, que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?" — Molière, Les Fourberies de Scapin, ii 11 (1671)

Gam'elyn (3 syl), youngest of the three sons of sir Johan di Bound's, who, on his death-bed, left "five plowes of land" to each of his two elder sons, and the residue of his property to the youngest. The eldest son took charge of Gamelyn, but entreated him shamefully. On one occasion he said to him,

"Stand still, gadelyng, and hold thy peace." To which the proud boy retorted, "I am no gadelyng, but the lawful son of a lady and true knight." On this, the elder brother sent his servants to chastise him, but he drove them off "with a pestel." At a wrestling match young Gamelyn threw the champion, and carried off the prize ram, but on reaching home found the door closed against him. He at once kicked the door down, and threw the porter into a well. The elder brother now bound the young madcap to a tree, and left him two days without food, but Adam, the spencer, unloosed him, and Gamelyn fell upon a party of ecclesiastics, who had come to dine with his brother, and "sprinkled holy water on them with a stout oaken cudgel." The sheriff sent to apprehend the young spitsire, but he fled with Adam into the woods, and came upon a party of foresters sitting at meat. The captain gave him welcome, and Gamelyn in time became "king of the outlaws." His brother, being sheriff, would have put him to death, but Gamelyn hanged his brother on a forest tree. After this the king appointed him chief ranger, and he married—Chaucer, Col'cle Tale of Gamelyn

Gammer Gurton's Needle, by Mr S. Master of Arts. It was in existence, says Warton, in 1551 (English Poetry, v. 32). Sir Walter Scott says "It was the supposed composition of John Stull, M.A., afterwards bishop of Bath and Wells," but in 1551 John Still was a boy not nine years old. The fun of this comedy turns on the loss and recovery of a needle, with which Gammer Gurton was repairing the breeches of her man Hodge. The comedy contains the famous drinking song, "I Cannot Eat but Little Meat."

Gammer Gurton's Needle is a great curiosity. The popular characters, such as The Sturdy Beggar, "The Clown," The Country Vicar and The Shrew of needle and this followed by the search for it, and its final recovery is intermixed with no other than a subordinate interest.—Sir W. Scott The Drama

Gamp (Sarah), a monthly nurse, residing in Kingsgate Street, High Holborn. Sarah was noted for her gouty umbrella, and for her perpetual reference to an hypothetical Mrs. Harris, whose opinions were a confirmation of her own. "Don't ask me," she said, "whether I won't take none, or whether I will, but leave the bottle on the chimelée-piece, and let me put my lips to it when I am so disposed." When Mrs. Prig, "her pardner," stretched out her hand to the teapot [filled with gin], Mrs. Gamp stopped the hand and said with great feeling, "No, Betsey! drink fair, wotever you do." Gan'elon (2 syl.), count of Mayence, the "Judah" of Charlemagne's paladins. His castle was built on the Blocksberg, the loftiest peak of the Hartz Mountains. Charlemagne was always trusting this base knight, and was as often betrayed by him. Although the very business of the paladins was the upholding of Christianity, sir Ganelon was constantly intriguing for its overthrow. No doubt, jealousy of sir Roland made him a traitor, and he brisely planned with Marsillus (the Moorish king), the attack of Roncesvalles. The character of sir Ganelon was marked with spite, dissimulation, and intrigue, but he was patient, obstinate, and enduring. He was six feet and a half in height, had large glaring eyes, and fiery red hair. He loved solitude, was very taciturn, disbelieved in the existence of moral good, and has become a by-word for a false and faithless friend. Dante has placed him in his "Inferno" (Sometimes called GAN.)

The most faithless spy since the days of Ganelon.—Sir W. Scott The Abbot xlv. (1870).

Ganem, "the Slave of Love." The hero and title of one of the Arabian Nights tales. Ganem was the son of a rich merchant of Damascus, named Abou Aïbou. On the death of his father he went to Bagdad, to dispose of the merchandise left, and accidentally saw three slaves secretly burying a chest in the earth. Curiosity induced him to disinter the chest, when, lo! it contained a beautiful woman, sleeping from the effects of a narcotic drug. He took her to his lodgings, and discovered that the victim was Fetnab, the caliph's favourite, who had been buried alive by order of the sultana, out of jealousy. When the caliph heard thereof, he was extremely jealous of the young merchant, and ordered him to be put to death, but he made good his escape in the guise of a waiter, and having concealed till the angry fit of the caliph had subsided. When Haroun-al-Raschid (the caliph) came to himself, and heard the unvarnished facts of the case, he pardoned Ganem, gave to him Fetnab for a wife, and appointed him to a lucrative post about the court.

Gareth (Sir), according to ancient romance, was the youngest son of Lot king of Orkney and Morgawse Arthur's [half]-sister. His mother, to deter him from entering Arthur's court, said, jestingly, she would consent to his so doing if he concealed his name and went as a scullion for twelve months. To this he agreed, and sir Kay, the king's steward, nicknamed him "Beaumains," because his hands were unusually large. At the end of the year he was knighted, and obtained the quest of Lynet, who craved the aid of some knight to liberate her sister Lionès, who was held prisoner by sir Ironside in Castle Perilous. Lynet treated sir Gareth with great contumely, calling him a washer of dishes and a kitchen knave, but he overthrew the five knights and liberated the lady, whom he married. The knights were—first, the Black Knight of the Black Lands or sir Percival (2 syl), the Green Knight or sir Pertolope, the Red Knight or sir Perimond's, the Blue Knight or sir Persaunt of India (four brothers), and lastly the Red Knight of the Red Lands or sir Ironside—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i. 120-153 (1470).

According to Tennyson, sir Gareth was "the last and tallest son of Lot king of Orkney and of Bellicent his wife." He served as kitchen knave in king Arthur's hall a twelvemonth and a day, and was nicknamed "Fair-hands" (Beaumains). At the end of twelve months he was knighted, and obtained leave to accompany Lynette to the liberation of her sister Lionors, who was held captive in Castle Perilous by a knight called Death or Mors. The passages to the castle were kept by four brothers, called by Tennyson, Morning Star or Phosphorus, Noonday Sun or Meridies, Evening Star or Hesperus, and Night or Nox, all of whom he overthrew. At length Death leapt from the cleft skull of Night, and prised the knight not to kill him, seeing that what he did his brothers had made him do. At starting, Lynette treated Gareth with great contumely, but softened to him more and more after each victory, and at last married him.

He that told the tale in olden times
Says that sir Gareth wedded Lionors
But he that told it later says Lynette.

Tennyson Idylls of the King (Gareth and Lynette)

Gareth and Lynet is in reality an allegory, a sort of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, describing the warfare of a Christian from birth to his entrance into glory. The "Bride" lived in Castle Perilous, and was named Lionès, Lynet represents the "carnal world" which lures the inhabitants of the City of Destruction into and jeers at everything the Christian does. Sir Gareth fought with four knights, keepers of the road—"to Zion or Castle Perilous, viz., Night, Dawn, Noonday, and Evening, meaning the temptations of the four ages of man. Having conquered in all these, he had to encounter the last enemy, which is death, and then the bride was won—the bride who lived in Castle Perilous or Mount Zion.

Tennyson, in his version of this beautiful allegory, has fallen in several grave errors, the worst of which is his making Gareth marry Lynet instead of the true bride. This is like sending a Pilgrim in the City of Destruction, after having finished his journey and passed the flood. Gareth's brother was wedded to the world (i.e. Lynet), but Gareth himself was married to the 'true Bride,' who dwelt in Castle Perilous. Another grave error is making Death crave of Gareth not to kill him, as what he did he was compelled to do by his elder brothers. I must confess that this to me is quite past understanding.—See Notes and Queries, January 19, February 16 March 16, 1878.

Gargamelle (3 syl), wife of Grangousier and daughter of the king of the Pyrrillions. On the day that she gave birth to Gargantua she ate 16 qrs 2 bush 3 pecks and a pipkin of dirt, the mere remains left in the tripe which she had for supper, although the tripe had been cleaned with the utmost care.—Rabelais, Gargantua, i. 4 (1533).

Gargamelle is an allegorical skit on the extravagance of queens, and the dirt is their pin-money.

Gargantua, son of Grangousier and Gargamelle. It needed 17,913 cows to supply the babe with milk. Like Gargantua (q v), he ate in his salad lettuces as big as walnut trees, in which were lurking six pilgrims from Sebastian. He founded and endowed the abbey of Thelème (2 syl), in remembrance of his victory over Picrochole (3 syl).—Rabelais, Gargantua, i. 7 (1533).

Of course, Gargantua is an allegorical skit on the allowance accorded to princes for their maintenance.

Gargantua's Mare. This mare was as big as six elephants, and had feet with fingers. On one occasion, going to school, the "boy" hung the bells of Notre Dame de Paris on his mare's neck.

jingles, but when the Parisians promised to feed his heist for nothing, he restored the peal. This mare had a terrible tail, "every whit as big as the steeple of St Mark's," and on one occasion, being annoyed by wasps, she switched it about so vigorously that she knocked down all the trees in the vicinity. Gargantua roared with laughter, and cried, "Je trouve beau ce!" whereupon the locality was called "Beauce"—Rabelais, Gargantua, 1 16 (1533).

* * Of course, this "mare" is in allegorical skit on the extravagance of court mistresses, and the "tail" is the suite in attendance on them.

Gargantua Curriculum, a course of studies including all languages, all sciences, all the fine arts, with all athletic sports and calisthenic exercises. Gringousier wrote to his son, saying

Garlic. The purveyor of the sultan of Casgar says he knew a man who lost his thumbs and great toes from eating garlic. The facts were these. A young man was married to the favourite of Zobeide, and partook of a dish containing garlic, when he went to his bride, she ordered him to be bound, and ent off his two thumbs and two great toes, for presuming to appear before her without having purified his fingers. Ever after this he always washed his hands 120 times with alkali and soap after partaking of garlic in a ragout.—Arabian Nights ("The Purveyor's Story").

Gar'ratt (The mayor of) Garratt is a village between Wandsworth and Loking. In 1780 the inhabitants associated themselves together to resist any further encroachments on their common, and the chairman was called the Mayor. The first "mayor" happened to be chosen on a general election, and so it was decreed that a new mayor should be appointed at each general election. This made excellent capital for electioneering squibs, and some of the greatest wits of the day have ventilated political grievances, gibbeted political characters, and sprinkled holy water with good stout orken cudgels under the mask of "addresses by the mayors of Garratt."

S Foote has a farce entitled The Mayor of Garratt (1763).

Garraway's, a coffee-house in Exchange Alley, which existed for 216 years, but is now pulled down. Here tea was sold in 1657 for sums varying from 16s to 50s per lb.

Garter. According to legend, Joan countess of Salisbury accidentally slipped her garter at a court ball. It was picked up by her royal partner, Edward III, who gallantly diverted the attention of the guests from the lady by binding the blue band round his own knee, saying, as he did so, "Honi soit qui mal y pense."

Gartha, sister of prince Oswald of Vero'na. When Oswald was slain in single combat by Gondibert (a combat provoked by his own treachery), Gartha used all her efforts to stir up civil war, but Hermegild, a man of great prudence, who loved her, was the author of wiser counsel, and diverted the anger of the camp by a funeral pageant of unusual splendour. As the tale is not finished, the ultimate lot of Gartha is unknown.—Sir William Davenant, Gondibert (died 1668).

Gascoigne (Sir William). Shakespeare says that prince Henry "struck the chief justice in the open court," but it does not appear from history that any blow was given. The fact is this.

One of the gay companions of the prince being committed for felony the prince demanded his release, but air William told him the only way of obtaining a release would be to get from the king a free pardon. Prince Henry now tried to rescue the prisoner by force when the judge ordered him out of court. In a towering fury the prince flew to the judgment seat and all thought he was about to slay the judge, but air William said very firmly and quietly, "I remember yourself. I hope here the place of the king's your sovereign lord and father to whom you owe double obedience, therefore I charge you in his name to desist of your wilfulness. And now for your contempt of you to the prison of the King's Bench whereunto I committe you and remaine there prisoner untill the pleasure of the king be further knowne." With which words the prince being abashed, the noble prisoner departed and went to the king's Bench.—Sir Thomas Elyot, The Governour (1531)

Gashford, secretary to lord George Gordon. A detestable, cruel sneak, who dupes his half-mad master, and leads him to imagine he is upholding a noble cause in plotting against the English catholics. To wreak vengeance on Geoffrey Haredale, he incites the rioters to burn "The Warren," where Haredale resided. Gashford commits suicide.—C Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1811)

Gaspar or Caspar ("the white one"), one of the three Magi or kings of Cologne. His offering to the infant Jesus was frankincense, in token of divinity.

* * * The other two were Melchior ("king of light"), who offered gold, symbolical of royalty, and Balthazar ("lord of treasures"), who offered myrrh, to denote that Christ would die klopstock, in his Messiah, makes the number of the Magi six, not one of which names agrees with those of Cologne Cathedral.

Gaudissart, the droll French brig-man

Gaul, son of Morni of Strumon. He was betrothed to Oith'ona daughter of Nuath, but before the day of marriage he was called away by Kingal to attend him on an expedition against the Britons. At the same time Nuath was at war, and sent for his son Lathmon, so Oith'ona was left unprotected in her home. Dunrommath lord of Uthal (or Cuthal) seized this opportunity to carry her off, and concealed her in a cave in the desert island of Trom'athon. When Gaul returned to claim his betrothed, he found she was gone, and was told by a vision in the night where she was hidden. Next day, with three followers, Gaul went to Trom'athon, and the ravisher coming up, he slew him and cut off his head Othlona, armed as a combatant, mingled with the fighters and was wounded Gaul saw what he thought a youth dying, and went to offer assistance, but found it was Othlona, who forthwith expired Disconsolate, he returned to Dnnlathmon, and thence to Morven—Ossian, Othlona

His voice was like many streams.—Ossian Fingal III.

(Homer makes a loud voice a thing to be much commended in a warrior)

Gaul (A) generally means a Frenchman, and Gallia means France, the country of the Celts or Keltai, called by the Greeks "Gallitai," and shortened into Galli. Wales is also called Gallia, Galis, and Gaul, especially in mediæval romance; hence, Amadis of Gaul is not Amadis of France, but Amadis of Wales, sir Lamorake de Galis is sir Lamorake of Wales. Gaul in France is Armorica or Little Britain (Brittany)

Gawain [Gaw'n], son of king Lot and Morgause (Arthur's sister) His brothers were Agravain, Ga'heris, and Ga'reth. The traitor Mordred was his half-brother, being the adulterous offspring of Morgause and prince Arthur. Lot was king of Orkney. Gawain was the second of the fifty knights created by king Arthur, Tor was the first, and was dubbed the same day (pt 1 48). When the adulterous passion of sir Launcelot for queen Guenever came to the knowledge of the king, sir Gawain insisted that the king's honour should be upheld. Accordingly, king Arthur went in battle array to Benwicke (Brittany), the "realm of sir Launcelot," and proclaimed war. Here sir Gawain fell, according to the prophecy of Merlin, "With this sword shall Launcelot slay the man that in this world he loved best" (pt 1 44). In this same battle the king was told that his bastard son Mordred had usurped his throne, so he hastened back with all speed, and in the great battle of the West received his mortal wound (pt 1 160-167).—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470)

Of Arthurian knights, Gawain is called the "Courteous," sir Kay the "Rude and Boastful," Mordred the "Traacherous," Launcelot the "Chivalrous," Galahad the "Chaste," Mark the "Dastard," sir Palomides (3 syl) the "Saracen," i.e. unbaptized, etc.

Gawky (Lord), Richard Grenville (1711-1770)

Gaw'rey, a flying woman, whose wings served the double purpose of flying and dress—R. Pultock, Peter Williams (1750)

Gay (Walter), in the firm of Dombey and Son, an honest, frank, ingenuous youth, who loved Florence Dombey, and comforted her in her early troubles. Walter Gay was sent in the merchantman called The Son and Heir, as junior partner, to Barbadoes, and survived a shipwreck. After his return from Barbadoes, he married Florence—C. Dickens, Dombey and Son (1816)

Gayless (Charles), the penniless suitor of Melissa. His valet is Sharp—Garrick, The Lying Valet (1741)

Gayville (Lord), the affianced husband of Miss Alserip "the heiress," whom he detests, but he ardently loves Miss Alton, her companion. The former is conceited, overbearing, and vulgar, but very rich, the latter is modest, retiring, and lady-like, but very poor. It turns out that £2000 a year of "the heiress's" property was entailed on sir William Charlton's heirs, and therefore descended to Mr. Clifford in right of his mother. This money Mr. Clifford settles on his sister, Miss Alton (whose real name is Clifford). Sir Clement Flint tears the conveyance, whereby Clifford retains the £2000 a year, and sir Clement settles the same amount on lord Gayville, who marries Miss Alton alias Miss Clifford.

Lady Emily Gayville, sister of lord Gayville. A bright, vivacious, and witty lady, who loves Mr. Clifford. Clifford also greatly loves lady Emily, but is deterred from proposing to her, because he is poor and unequal to her in a social position. It turns out that he comes into £2000 a year in right of his mother, lady Charlton, and is thus enabled to offer himself to the lady, by whom he is accepted.—General Burgoyne, The Heiress (1781)

Geith (George), a model of untiring industry, perseverance, and moral courage. Undaunted by difficulties, he pursued his onward way, and worked as long as breath was left him—Mrs. Traillford [Riddell], George Geith

Gelert, Llewellyn's favourite hound. One day, Llewellyn returned from hunting, when Gelert met him smeared with gore. The chieftain felt alarmed, and instantly went to look for his baby son. He found the cradle overturned, and all around was sprinkled with gore and blood. He called his child, but no voice replied, and thinking the hound had eaten it, he stabbed the animal to the heart. The tumult awoke the baby boy, and on searching more carefully, a huge wolf was found under the bed, quite dead. Gelert had slain the wolf and saved the child.

And now a gallows tomb they raise

With costly soil there decked

And mark let it read with loud praise

Poor Gelert's bones to rest.

Hon. W. R. Spencer Welsh-Gelert (Gelert's Grave)

* * This tale, with a slight difference, is common to all parts of the world. It is told in the Gesta Romanorum of Iolliculus, a knight, but the wolf is a "serpent," and Iolliculus, in repentance, makes a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. In the Sanskrit version, given in the Pantschatantra (A.D. 540), the tale is told of the brahmin Devasaman, an "ichneumon" and "black snake" taking the places of the dog and the wolf. In the Arabic version by Nasr-Allah (twelfth century), a "vaselet" is substituted for the dog, in the Mongolian Uligern a "polecat," in the Persian Sindbadnâmeh, a "cat," and in the Hutopadesa (iv 3), an "otter." In the Chinese Forest of Pearls from the Garden of the Law, the dog is an "ichneumon," as in the Indian version (A.D. 668). In Sandabar, and also in the Hebrew version, the tale is told of a dog. A similar tale is told of czar Piras of Russia, and another occurs in the Seven Wise Masters.

Gellatly (Davie), idiot servant of the baron of Bradwardine (3 syl.)

Old Janet Gellatly, the idiot's mother—Sir W. Scott, Waverley (time, George II.)

* * In some editions the word is spelt "Gellatley."

Genev'ra. (See GINEURA)

* * Queen Guinever or Gnevever is sometimes called "Genevra," or "Genevra"

Gene'va Bull (The), Stephen Marshall, a Calvinistic preacher

Geneviève (St), the patron saint of Paris, born at Nanterre. She was a shepherdess, but went to Paris when her parents died, and was there during Attila's invasion (A D 451). She told the citizens that God would spare the city, and "her prediction came true." At another time, she procured food for the Parisians suffering from famine. At her request, Clovis built the church of St Pierre et St Paul, afterwards called Ste Geneviève. Her day is January 3. Her relics are deposited in the Panthéon now called by her name (419-512)

Genu or Ginn, an intermediate race between angels and men. They ruled on earth before the creation of Adam—D Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, 357 (1697)

* * Solomon is supposed to preside over the whole race of genu. This seems to have arisen from a mere confusion of words of somewhat similar sound. The chief of the genu was called a suleyman, which got corrupted into a proper name

Genius and Common Sense T Moore says that Common Sense and Genius once went out together on a ramble by moonlight. Common Sense went prosing on his way, arrived home in good time, and went to bed, but Genius, while gazing at the stars, stumbled into a river, and died

* * This story is told of Thales the philosopher by Plato. Chaucer has also an allusion thereto in his Miller's Tale

So ferde another clerk with stromomye :

He walked in the feeldes for to pryve

Till he was in a maris pit I fall.

Chaucer Canterbury Tales 3457 etc. (1333).

Genna'ro, the natural son of Lucrezia di Borgia (daughter of pope Alexander VI) before her marriage with Alfonso duke of Ferrara. He was brought up by a Neapolitan fisherman. In early manhood he went to Venice, heard of the scandalous cruelty of Lucrezia, and, with the heedless petulance of youth, mutilated the duke's escutcheon by striking out the B, thus converting Borgia into Orgia (orgies). Lucrezia demanded vengeance, and Gennaro was condemned to death by poison. When Lucrezia discovered that the offender was her own son, she gave him an antidote to the poison, and set him free. Not long after this, at a banquet given by Negro'ni, Lucrezia revealed herself to Gennaro as his mother, and both expired of poison in the banquet hall—Donzetti, Lucrezia di Borgia (1834)

Gennil (Ralph), a veteran in the troop of sir Hugo de Lacy—Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Genove'fa, wife of Siegfried count palatine of Brabant. Being suspected of infidelity, she was driven into the forest of Ardennes, where she gave birth to a son, who was suckled by a white doe. After a time, Siegfried discovered his error, and both mother and child were restored to their proper home—German Popular Stories

Tieck and Müller have popularized the tradition, and Raupach has made it the subject of a drama

Gentle Shepherd (The), George Grenville. In one of his speeches, he exclaimed in the House, "Tell me where!" when Pitt hummed the line of a popular song, "Gentle Shepherd, tell me where!" and the House was convulsed with laughter (1712-1770)

Gentle Shepherd (The), the title and chief character of Allan Ramsay's pastoral (1725)

Gentleman of Europe (The First), George IV (1762, 1820-1830)

It was the "first gentleman in Europe" in whose high presence Mrs. Rawdon passed her examination and took her degree in reputation: so it must be flat disloyalty to doubt her virtue. What a noble appreciation of character must there not have been in Vanity Fair when that august sovereign was invested with the title of Premier Gentilhomme of all Europe!—Thackeray Vanity Fair (1843).

Gentleman of Europe (First), Louis d'Artois

George (Honest) General Monk, George duke of Albemarle, was so called by the votaries of Cromwell (1608-1670)

George (Mr), a stalwart, handsome simple-hearted fellow, son of Mrs Rouncewell the housekeeper at Chesney Wold. He was very wild as a lad and ran away from his mother to enlist as a soldier, but on his return to England he opened a shooting-gallery in Leicester Square, London. When sir Leicester Dedlock, in his old age, fell into trouble, George became his faithful attendant — C Dickens, Bleak House (1853)

George (St), the patron saint of England. He was born at Lydda, but brought up in Cappadocia, and suffered martyrdom in the reign of Diocletian, April 23, A.D. 303. Mr Hogg tells us of a Greek inscription at Ezra, in Syria, dated 346, in which the martyrdom of St George is referred to. At this date was living George bishop of Alexandria, with whom Gibbon, in his Decline and Fall, has confounded the patron saint of England, but the bishop died in 362, or fifty-nine years after the prince of Cappadocia (See RED CROSS KNIGHT)

 Mussulmans revere St George under the name of "Gherghis"

St George's Bones were taken to the church in the city of Constantinople

St George's Head. One of his heads was preserved at Rome. Long forgotten, it was rediscovered in 1751, and was given in 1600 to the church of Ferrara. Another of his heads was preserved in the church of Mares-Moutier, in Picardy

St George's Limbs. One of his arms fell from heaven upon the altar of Pantaleon, at Cologne. Another was preserved in a religious house of Barala, and was transferred thence in the ninth century to Cambrai. Part of an arm was presented by Robert of Flanders to the city of Toulouse, another part was given to the abbey of Auchin, and another to the countess Matilda

George and the Dragon (St). St George, son of lord Albert of Coventry, was stolen in infancy by "the weird lady of the woods," who brought the lad up to deeds of arms. His body had three marks: a dragon on the breast, a garter round one of the legs, and a blood-red cross on the right arm. When he grew to manhood, he fought against the Saracens. In Libya he heard of a huge dragon, to which a damsel was daily given for food, and it so happened that when he arrived the victim was Sabra, the king's daughter. She was already tied to the stake when St George came up. On came the dragon, but the knight, thrusting his lance into the monster's mouth, killed it on the spot. Sabra, being brought to England, became the wife of her deliverer, and they lived happily in Coventry, till death.—Perey, Reliques, III in 2

St George and the Dragon, on old guinea-pieces, was the design of Pistrucci. It was an adaptation of a didrachm of Tarentum, B.C. 250

 The encounter between George and the dragon took place at Berytus (Beyrut)

The tale of St George and the dragon is told in the Golden Legends of Jacques de Voragine — See S. Brang-Gould, Curious Myths of the Middle Ages

George I and the duchess of Kendal (1719). The duchess was a German, whose name was Erangard Melrose de Schulemburg. She was created duchess of Munster, in Ireland, baroness Glastonbury, countess of Feversham, and duchess of Kendal (died 1743)

George II. His favourite was Mary Howard, duchess of Suffolk

George II, when angry, vented his displeasure by kicking his hat about the room. We are told that Xerxes vented his displeasure at the loss of his bridges by ordering the Hellespont to be fettered, lashed with 300 stripes, and insulted

George III and the Fan Quakeless. When George III was about 20 years of age, he fell in love with Hannah Lightfoot, daughter of a linen-draper in Market Street, St James's. He married her in Kew Church, 1759, but of course the marriage was not recognized (See LOVERS)

 The following year (September, 1760), he married the princess Charlotte of Mecklenburg Strelitz. Hannah Lightfoot married a Mr. Wford, and passed out of public notice

George IV and Mrs Mary Robinson, generally called Perdita

Mar. Darby, at the age of 15, married Mr Robinson who lived a few months on credit, and was then imprisoned for debt. Mrs Robinson sought a livelihood on the stage, and George IV, then prince of Wales and a mere lad, saw her as "Perdita," fell in love with her, corresponded with her under the assumed name of "Florizel," and gave her a bond for £20,000, subsequently cancelled for an annuity of £500 (1768-1800).

* * George IV was born in 1762, and was only 16 in 1778, when he fell in love with Mrs Robinson. The young prince suddenly abandoned her, and after two other love affairs, privately married, at Carlton House (in 1785), Mrs Fitzherbert, a lady of good family, and a widow, seven years his senior. The marriage being contrary to the law, he married the princess Caroline of Brunswick, in 1793, but still retained his connection with Mrs Fitzherbert, and added a new favourite, the countess of Jersey.

George (of LAVAL), a friend of Horace de Bienne (2 syl). Having committed forgery, Carlos (alias marquis d'Antas), being cognizant of it, hid him in his power, but Ogarta (alias Martha) obtained the document, and returned it to George — I Stirling, Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

George-a-Green, the pinner or pound-keeper of Wakefield, one of the chosen favourites of Robin Hood.

Yeni Wakefield, perambulation
Ubi gloriens Georgiana Greenum,

George Street (Strand, London), one of a series of streets named after the second duke of Buckingham. The series consists of George Street, Villiers Street, Duke Street, and Buckingham Street.

Georgian Women (The). Allah, rushing to stool his celestial harem, commissioned an imaum to select for him forty of the loveliest women he could find. The imaum journeyed into Frankistan, and from the country of the English carried off the king's daughter. From Germany he selected other maidens, but when he arrived at Gori (north-west of Tiflis) he fell in love with one of the beauties, and tarried there. Allah punished him by death, but the maidens remained in Gori, and became the mothers of the most beautiful race of mortals in the whole earth — A Legend.

Georgina [Vesey], daughter of sir John Vesey. Pretty, but vain and frivolous. She loved, as much as her heart was susceptible of such a passion, sir Frederick Blount, but wavered between her liking and the policy of marrying Alfred Evelyn, a man of great wealth. When she thought the property of Evelyn was insecure, she at once gave her hand to sir Frederick — Lord L. Bulwer-Lytton, Money (1840).

Geraint (Sir), of Devon one of the knights of the Round Table. He was married to Enid, only child of Yniol. Fearing lest Enid should be tainted by the queen, sir Geraint left the court, and retired to Devon. Half sleeping and half waking, he overheard part of Enid's words, and fancying her to be unfaithful to him, treated her for a time with great harshness, but Enid nursed him when he was wounded with such wisely tenderness that he could no longer doubt her fealty, and a complete understanding being established, "they crowned a happy life with a fair death" — Tennyson Idylls of the King ("Geraint and Enid").

Ger'aldin (Lord), son of the earl of Glenallan. He appears first as William Lovell, and afterwards as major Neville. He marries Isabella Wardour (daughter of sir Arthur Wardour).

Sir Aynor d. Geraldin, an ancestor of lord Geraldin — Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Ger'aldine (3 syl), a young man, who comes home from his travels to find his playfellow (that should have been his wife) married to old Wincott, who receives him hospitably as a friend of his father's, takes delight in hearing tales of his travels, and treats him most kindly. Geraldine and the wife mutually agree not in any wise to wrong so noble and confident, an old gentleman — John Heywood, The English Traveller (1576-1615).

Geraldine (Lady), an orphan, the ward of her uncle count de Valmont, and the betrothed of Floran ("the founding of the forest," and the adopted son of the count) This foundling turns out to be his real son, who had been rescued by his mother and carried into the forest to save him from the hands of Longueville, a desperate villain—W. Dimond, The Foundling of the Forest

Geraldine (The Fair), the lady whose praises are sung by Henry Howard earl of Surrey. Supposed to be Elizabeth Fitzgerald, daughter of Gerald Fitzgerald ninth earl of Kildare. She married the earl of Lincoln.

Gerard (John), an English botanist (1515-1607), who compiled the Catalogus Arborum, Fructuum, et Plantarum, tam Indigenarum quam Exoticarum, in Horto Johannis Gerardi. Also author of the Herbal or General History of Plants (1597)

GREW
(1613)

Gerard, attendant of sir Patrick Charleis (provost of Perth)—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Gerhard the Good, a merchant of Cologne, who exchanges his rich freight for a cargo of Christian slaves, that he may give them their liberty. He retains only one, who is the wife of William king of England. She is about to marry the merchant's son, when the king suddenly appears, disguised as a pilgrim. Gerhard restores the wife, ships both off to England, refuses all recompense, and remains a merchant as before—Rudolf of Ems (a minnesinger), Gerhard the Good (thirteenth century)

Gerion. So William Browne, in his Britannia's Pastorals (fifth song), calls Philip of Spain. The allusion is to Geryon of Gadès (Cádiz), a monster with three bodies (or, in other words, a king over three kingdoms) slain by Hercules.

 The three kingdoms over which Philip reigned were Spain, Germany, and the Netherlands.

Gerlinda or Gurlint, the mother of Hartmuth king of Norway. When Hartmuth carried off Gudrun the daughter of Hettel (Attila), who refused to marry him, Gerlinda put her to the most menial work, such as washing the dirty linen. But her lover, Herwig king of Heligoland, invaded Norway, and having gained a complete victory, put Gerlinda to death—An Anglo-Saxon Poem (thirteenth century)

German Literature (Father of), Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781)

Germany, formerly called Tongres. The name was changed (according to fable) in compliment to Germain, sister of Julius Cæsar, and wife of Salvius Brabon duke of Brabant—Jehan de Maire, Illustrations de Gaule, iii 20-23.

Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Ebranceus, one of the descendants of Brutus king of Britain, had twenty sons, all of whom, except the eldest, settled in Tongres, which was then called Germani, because it was the land of the germans or brothers.

These Germans did subdue all Germany
Of whom it light.

Spenser Fairy Queen ii. 10 (1590)

Geronimo, the friend of Sganarelle (3 syl). Sganarelle asks him if he would advise his marrying. "How old are you?" asks Geronimo, and being told that he is 63, and the girl under 20, says, "No." Sganarelle, greatly displeased at his advice, declares he is hale and strong, that he loves the girl, and has promised to marry her. "Then do as you like," says Geronimo—Molière, Le Mariage Forcé (1664).

 This joke is borrowed from Rabelais. Panurge asks Pantagruel whether he advises him to marry. "Yes," says the prince, whereupon Panurge states several objections. "Then don't," says the prince. "But I wish to marry," says Panurge. "Then do it by all means," says the prince. Every time the prince advises him to marry, Panurge objects, and every time the prince advises the contrary, the advice is equally unacceptable—Pantagruel, iii 9 (1515).

Geronte (2 syl), father of Léandre and Hyacinthe, a miserly old hunk. He has to pay Scapin £30 for the "ransom" of Léandre, and after having exhausted every evasion, draws out his purse to pay the money, saying, "The Turk is a villain!" "Yes," says Scapin. "A rascal!" "Yes," says Scapin. "A thief!" "Yes," says Scapin. "He would wring from me £30! would he?" "Yes," says Scapin. "Oh, if I catch him, won't I pay him out?" "Yes," says Scapin. Then, putting his purse back into his pocket, he walks off, saying, "Pay the ransom, and bring back the boy." "But the money, where's the money?" says Scapin. "Oh, didn't I give it you?" "No," says Scapin. "I forgot," says Géronte, and he pays the money (act II) — Molière, Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671)

In the English version, called The Cheats of Scapin, by Otway, Geronte is called "Gripe," Hyacinthe is called "Clara," Leandre is Anglicized into "Leander," and the sum of money borrowed is £200, instead of 500 écus

Geronte (2 syl), the father of Lucinde (2 syl) He wanted his daughter to marry Horace, but as she loved Leandre, in order to avoid a marriage she detested she pretended to have lost the power of articulate speech, and only answered, "Han, lu, hon!" "Han, lu, hon, han!" Sganarelle, "le medecin malgré lui," seeing that this jargon was put on, and ascertaining that Lucinde was her lover, introduced him as an apothecary, and the young man soon effected a perfect cure with "pills matrimoniales" — Molière, Le Médecin Malade Lui (1666)

Ger'rard, king of the beggars, disguised under the name of Clause He is the father of Florez the rich merchant of Bruges — Berumont and Fletcher, The Beggars' Bush (1622)

Ger'trude (2 syl), Hamlet's mother On the death of her husband, who was king of Denmark, she married Claudius, the late king's brother Gertrude was accessory to the murder of her first husband, and Claudius was principal Claudius prepared poisoned wine, which he intended for Hamlet, but the queen, not knowing it was poisoned, drank it and died Hamlet, seeing his mother fall dead, rushed on the king and killed him — Shakespeare, Hamlet (1596)

* * In the History of Hamblett, Gertrude is called "Geruth"

Gertrude, daughter of Albert patriarch of Wyoming One day, an Indian brought to Albert a lad (nine years old) named Henry Waldegrave (2 syl), and told the patriarch he had promised the boy's mother, at her death, to place her son under his care The lad remained at Wyoming for three years, and was then sent to his friends When grown to manhood, Henry Waldegrave returned to Wyoming, and married Gertrude, but three months afterwards, Brandt, at the head of a mixed army of British and Indians, attacked the settlement, and both Albert and Gertrude were shot Henry Waldegrave then joined the army of Washington, which was fighting for American independence — Campbell, Gertrude of Wyoming (1809)

* * Campbell accents Wyoming on the first syllable, but it is more usual to throw the accent on the second Gerun'dio (Frays), i.e. Friar Gerund the hero and title of a Spanish romance, by the jesuit De l'Isle It is a satire on the absurdities and bad taste of the popular preachers of the time (1758).

Ger'yon's Sons, the Spaniards, so called from Geryon, an ancient king of Spain, whose oxen were driven off by Heracles This task was one of the hero's "twelve labours" Milton uses the expression in Paradise Lost, vi 410 (1665)

Geryon'eo, a human monster with three bodies He was of the race of giants, being the son of Geryon, the tyrant who gave all strangers "as food for his kine, the fairest and the fiercest kine alive" Gervoneo promised to take the young widow Belgê (2 syl) under his protection, but it was like the wolf protecting the lamb, for "he gave her children to a dreadful monster to devour" In her despair, she applied to king Arthur for help, and the British king, espousing her cause, soon sent Geryoneo "down to the house of dole" — Spenser, Lycery Queen, v 10, 11 (1596)

* * "Geryoneo" is the house of Austria, and Philip of Spain in particular "King Arthur" is England, and the earl of Leicester in particular The "Widow Belgê" is the Netherlands, and the monster that devoured her children the inquisition, introduced by the duke of Alva "Geryoneo" had three bodies, for Philip ruled over three kingdoms — Spain, Germany, and the Netherlands The earl of Leicester, sent in 1585 to the aid of the Netherlands, broke off the yoke of Philip

Ges'mas, the impenitent thief crucified with our Lord In the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, he is called Gestas The penitent thief was Dismas, Dysmas, Demas, or Dumacus

Three bodies on three crosses hang supine
Dismas and Gesmas and the Power Divine.
Dismas seeks heaven Gesmas his own damnation
The third one seeks our ransom and salvation
E.C.B. Translation of a Latin Charm.

Gessler (Albrecht), the brutal and tyrannical governor of Switzerland, appointed by Austria over the three forest cantons When the people rose in rebellion, Gessler insulted them by hoisting his cap on a pole, and threatening death to any one who refused to bow down to it in reverence. William Tell refused to do so, and was compelled to shoot at an apple placed on the head of his own son. Having dropped an arrow by accident, Gessler demanded why he had brought a second. "To shoot you," said the intrepid mountaineer, "if I fail in my task." Gessler then ordered him to be cast into Kussnacht Castle, "a prey to the reptiles that lodged there." Gessler went in the boat to see the order executed, and as the boat neared land, Tell leapt on shore, pushed back the boat, shot Gessler, and freed his country from Austrian domination — Rossini, Guglielmo Tell (1829).

Geta, according to sir Walter Scott, the representative of a stock slave and rogue in the new comedy of Greece and Rome (? Gétés).

The principal character upon whose devices and ingenuity the whole plot usually turns, is the Geta of the piece—a witty rogish insinuating and malignant slave, the confidant of a wild and extravagant son whom he aids in his pious endeavours to cheat a suspicious severe and gripping father — Sir Walter Scott, The Drama.

Ghengis Khan, a title assumed by Tamerlane or Timour the Tartar (1336-1105).

Ghilan, a district of Persia, notoriously unhealthy, and rife with fever, ague, cholera, and plague. Hence the Persian proverb

Let him who is tired of life retire to Ghilan "

Giaffir [Djaf fir], pacha of Abv'dos, and father of Zuleika [Zu lee' kah]. He tells his daughter he intends her to marry the governor of Magnesia, but Zuleika has given her plight to her cousin Selim. The lovers take to flight, Giaffir pursues and shoots Selim, Zuleika dies of grief, and the father lives on, a broken-hearted old man, calling to the winds, "Where is my daughter?" and echo answers, "Where?" — Byron, Bride of Abydos (1813).

Giam'schid [Jam shid], suleyman of the Persis. Having reigned seven hundred years, he thought himself immortal, but God, in punishment, gave him a human form, and sent him to live on earth, where he became a great conqueror, and ruled over both the East and West. The bulwark of the Persis abode was composed of green chrysolite the reflection of which gives to the sky its deep blue-green hue.

Soul beamed forth in every spark
That darted from beneath the lid
Bright as the Jewel of Giam'schid.

Byron, The Giaour (1813).

She only wished the amorous monarch had shown more ardour for the carbuncle of Giam'schid. — Beckford, Vathek (1789).

Giants of Mythology and Fable Strabo makes mention of the skeleton of a giant 60 cubits in height. Pliny tells us of another 46 cubits. Boetius describes the body of a giant from bones discovered in a cave near Trapani, in Sicily, 200 cubits in length. One tooth of this "giant" weighed 200 ounces, but Kircher says the tooth and bones were those of a mastodon.

Giant's Leap (Lam Go'nagot) or

"Gommagot's Leap" Now called Haw, near Plymouth. The legend is that Corineus (3 syl) wrestled with Gomagot king of the Albion giants, heaved the monster on his shoulder, carried him to the top of a high rock, and cast him into the sea.

At the beginning of the encounter Corineus and the giant, standing front to front, held each other strongly by their arms, and panted aloud for breath. But Gomagot presently galling Corineus with all his might, broke three of his ribs, two on the right side and one on his left. Corineus, deeply wounded, rose up by his whole strength, snatched up the giant man with him on his shoulders to the neighbouring cliff, and heaved him into the sea. The place where he fell is called Leap Gomagot to this day.—Geoffrey Friar's Purport 16 (1114)

Giaour [dyoc'er] Byron's tale called The Giaour is supposed to be told by a Turkish fisherman who had been employed all the day in the gulf of Tegenia, and landed his boat at night-fall on the Pireus, now called the harbour of Port Leone. He was eye-witness of all the incidents, and in one of them a principal agent (see line 852 "I hear the sound of coming feet"). The tale is thus: Lailah, the beautiful concubine of the caliph Hassan, falls in love with a giaour, flees from the seraglio, is overtaken by an emir, put to death, and cast into the sea. The giaour cleaves Hassan's skull, flees for his life, and becomes a monk. Six years afterwards he tells his history to his father confessor on his death-bed, and prays him to "lay his body with the humblest dead, and not even to inscribe his name on his tomb." Accordingly, he is called "the Giaour," and is known by no other name (1813).

Giauhar (4 syl), daughter of the king of Saman'dal, the mightiest of the under-sea empires. When her father was made captive by Ling Saleh, she emerged for safety to a desert island, where she met Beder the young king of Persia, who proposed to make her his wife, but Giauhar "spat on him," and changed him "into a white bird with red beak and red legs." The bird was sold to a certain king, and, being disenchanted, resumed the human form. After several marvellous adventures, Beder again met the under-sea princess, proposed to her again, and she became his wife and queen of Persia.—Arabian Nights ("Beder and Giauhar")

Gibbet, a foot-pad and a convict, who "left his country for his country's good." He piqued himself on being "the best-behaved man on the road."

—'Twas for the good of my country I should be abroad.—George Farquhar, The British Strategem III. 3 (1707)

Gifford (William), author of The Baviad, a poetical satire, which annihilated the Della Crusca school of poets (1794). In 1796, Gifford published The Alaniad, to expose the low state of dramatic authorship.

He was a man with whom I had no literary sympathies. He had however a heart full of kindness for all living creatures except authors; then he regarded as a fishmonger regarded eels, or as Isaac Walton did worms.—Southey

Giggleswick Fountain ebbs and flows eight times a day. The tale is that Giggleswick was once a nymph living with the Oreads on mount Craven. A satyr chanced to see her, and resolved to win her, but Giggleswick fled to escape her pursner, and praving to the "topic gods" (the local genn), was converted into a fountain, which still pants with fear. The tale is told by Drayton, in his Polyolbion, xxviii (1622)

Gil Blas, son of Blas of Santilla'n's 'squire or "cseudero" to a lady, and brought up by his uncle, canon Gil Perès. Gil Blas went to Dr Godinez's school, of Oviedo [Ov e a' do], and obtained the reputation of being a great scholar. He had fair abilities, a kind heart, and good inclinations, but was easily led astray by his vanity. Full of wit and humour, but lax in his morals. Duped by others at first, he afterwards played the same devices on those less experienced. As he grew in years, however, his conduct improved, and when his fortune was made he became an honest, steady man—Lesage, Gil Blas (1715)

(Lesage has borrowed largely from the romance of Espinel, called Vida del Escudero Marcos de Obregon (1618), from which he has taken his prologue, the adventure of the parasite (bk 1 2), the dispersion of the company of Cacabelos by the muletter (bk 1 3), the incident of the robber's cave (bk 1 4, 5), the surprise by the corsairs, the contributions levied by don Raphael and Ambrose (bk 1 15, 16), the service with the duke of Lerma, the character of Sangrado (called by Espinel Sagredo), and even the reply of don Matthias de Silva when asked to fight a duel early in the morning, "As I never rise before one, even for party of pleasure, it is unreasonable to expect that I should rise at six to have my throat cut," bk iii 8)

Longfellow, The Golden Legend

Gilderoy, a famous robber. There were two of the name, both handsome Scotchmen, both robbers, and both were hanged. One lived in the seventeenth century, and "had the honour" of robbing cardinal Richelieu and Oliver Cromwell. The other was born in Roslin, in the eighteenth century, and was executed in Edinburgh for "stealing sheep, horses, and oxen." In the Percy Reliques, I iii 12, is the lament of Gilderoy's widow at the execution of her "handsome" and "winsome" Gilderoy, and Campbell has a ballad on the same subject. Both are entitled "Gilderoy," and refer to the latter robber, but in Thomson's Orpheus Caledonius, ii 18 a copy of the older ballad.

* * Thomson's ballad places Gilderoy in the reign of Mary "queen of Scots," but this is not consistent with the tradition of his robbing Richelieu and Cromwell. We want a third Gilderoy for the reign of queen Mary—one living in the sixteenth century.

Gilding a Boy. Leo XII killed the boy Mortara by gilding him all over to adorn a pageant.

Gildippe (3 syl), wife of Edward an English baron, who accompanied her husband to Jerusalem, and performed prodigies of valour in the war (bk ix). Both she and her husband were slain by Solyman (bk xx)—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

Giles, a farmer in love with Patty, "the maid of the mill," and promised to him by her father, but Patty refuses to marry him. Ultimately, the "maid of the mill" marries lord Aumworth. Giles is a blunt, well-meaning, working farmer, of no education, no refinement, no notion of the amenities of social life—Bickerstaff, The Maid of the Mill

Gill (Harry), a farmer, who forbade old Goodv Blake to carry home a few sticks, which she had picked up from his land, to light a wee-bit fire to warm herself by. Old Goodv Blake cursed him for his incivility, saying he should never from that moment cease from shivering with cold, and, sure enough, from that hour, a-bed or up, summer or winter, at home or abroad, his teeth went "chatter, chatter, chatter still." Clothing was of no use, fires of no avail, for, spite of all, he muttered, "Poor Harry Gill is very cold"—Wordsworth, Goodv Blake and Harry Gill (1798)

Gillamoro (3 syl) or Guillamur, king of Ireland, being slain in battle by Arthur, Ireland was added by the conqueror to his own dominions

Gillian (Dame), brewer's woman to lady Evelyn and wife of Raoul the hunt-man—Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II.)

Gillflowers. A nosegay of these flowers was given by the fairy Amazona to Carpullona in her flight. The virtue of this nosegay was, that so long as the princess had it about her person, those who knew her before would not recognize her.—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Princess Carpullona," 1682)

Gills (Slomon), ship's instrument maker. A slow, thoughtful old man, disciple of Walter Gay, who was in the house of Mr Dombey, mercurial Gills was very proud of his stock-in-trade, but never seemed to sell anything—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846)

Gilpin (John), a linen-draper and train-band captain, living in London. His wife said to him, "Though we have been married twenty years, we have taken no holiday," and at her advice the well-to-do linen-draper agreed to make a family party, and dine at the Bell, at Edmonton. Mrs Gilpin, her sister, and four children went in the chaise, and Gilpin promised to follow on horseback. As madam had left the wine behind, Gilpin girded it in two stone bottles to his belt, and started on his way. The horse, being fresh, began to trot, and then to gallop, and John, being a bad rider, grasped the mane with both his hands. On went the horse, off flew John Gilpin's clock, together with his hat and wig. The dogs barked, the children screamed, the turnpike men (thinking he was riding for a wager) flung open their gates. He flew through Edmonton, and never stopped till he reached Ware, when his friend the calendar gave him welcome, and asked him to dismount. Gilpin, however, declined, saying his wife would be expecting him. So the calendar furnished him with another hat and wig, and Gilpin harked back again, when similar disasters occurred, till the horse stopped at his house in London—W. Cowper, John Gilpin (1786)

John Gilpin was a Mr Beyer, of Paternoster Row, who died in 1791, and it was lady Austin who told the anecdote to the poet. The marriage adventure of commodore Truncheon, in Percy's Piel, is a similar adventure.

Giltspur Street, a street in West Smithfield, built on the route taken by the knights (who wore gilt spurs) on their way to Smithfield, where the tournaments were held.

Ginés de Passamonte, one of the galleyslaves set free by don Quixote. Ginés had written a history of his life and adventures. After being liberated, the slaves set upon the night, they assaulted him with stones, robbed him and Sancho of everything they valued, broke to pieces "Mambrino's helmet," and then made off with all possible speed, taking Sancho's ass with them. After a time the ass was recovered (pt I iv 3).

"Bark ye friends" said the galley slave. "Cries is my name and I am the title of my family"—Cervantes, Don Quixote I. li. 8 (1605).

* * This Gines re-appears in pt II n 7 as "Peter the showman," who exhibits the story of "Melisendra and don Gayferos" The helmet also is presented whole and sound at the inn, where it becomes a matter of dispute whether it is a basin or a helmet

Gineura, the troth-plight bride of Ariodantès, falsely accused of infidelity, and doomed to die unless she found within a month a champion to do battle for her honour The duke who accused her felt confident that no champion would appear, but on the day appointed Ariodantès himself entered the lists The duke was slain, the lady vindicated, and the champion became Gineura's husband — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516) Also GLNEURA

Shakespeare, in Much Ado about Nothing, makes Hero falsely accused of infidelity, through the malice of don John, who induces Margaret (the lady's attendant) to give Borachio a rendezvous at the lady's chamber window While this was going on, Claudio, the betrothed lover of Hero, was brought to a spot where he might witness the scene, and, believing Margaret to be Hero, was so indignant, that next day at the altar he denounced Hero as unworthy of his love Benedict challenged Claudio for slander, but the combat was prevented by the arrest and confession of Borachio Don John, finding his villainy exposed, fled to Messina

Spenser has introduced a similar story in his Faery Queen, v 11 (the tale of "Irena," q v)

Gin'evra, the young Italian bride who, playing hide-and-seek, hid herself in a large trunk The lid accidentally fell down, and was held fast by a spring-lock Many years afterwards the trunk was sold and the skeleton discovered — Rogers, Italy (1822)

Ginn or Jân (singular masculine Jinnee, feminine Jinniveli), a species of beings created long before Adam They were formed of "smokeless fire" or fire of the simoom, and were governed by monarchs named suleyman, the last of whom was Jân-ibn-Jân or Gian-ben-Gian, who "built the pyramids of Egypt" Prophets were sent to convert them, but on their persistent disobedience, an army of angels drove them from the earth Among the ginn was one named Aza'zel When Adam was created, and God commanded the angels to worship him, Azazel refused, saying, "Why should the spirits of fire worship a creature made of earth?" Whereupon God changed him into a devil, and called him Iblis or Eblis ("despair")

Gi'ona, a leader of the anabaptists, once a servant of comte d'Oberthal, but discharged from his service for theft He joined the rebellion of the anabaptists, but, with the rest of the conspirators, betrayed the "prophet-king," John of Leyden, when the emperor arrived with his army — Meyerbeer, Le Prophète (1849)

Giovan'ni (Don), a Spanish libertine of the aristocratic class His valet, Leporello, says, "He had 700 mistresses in Italy, 800 in Germany, 91 in France and Turkey, and 1003 in Spain" When the measure of his iniquity was full, a legion of foul fiends carried him off to the devouring gulf — Mozart's opera, Don Giovanni (1787)

(The libretto of this opera is by Lorenzo da Ponte)

* * The origin of this character was don Juan Tenorio, of Seville, who lived in the fourteenth century The traditions concerning him were dramatized by Tirso de Molina, thence passed into Italy and France Glück has a musical ballet called Don Juan (1765), Molière, a comedy on the same subject (1665), and Thomas Corneille (brother of the Grand Corneille) brought out, in 1673, a comedy on the same subject, called Le Festin de Pierre, which is the second title of Molière's Don Juan Goldoni, called "The Italian Molière"

Giralda of Seville, called by the Knight of the Mirrors a giantess, whose body was of brass, and who, without ever shifting her place, was the most unsteady and changeable female in the world. In fact, this Giralda was no other than the brazen statue on a steeple in Seville, serving for a weathercock.

I fixed the changeable Giralda. I obliged her to stand still; for during the space of a whole week, no wind blew but from the north. — Cervantes, Don Quixote II. l. 14 (1615)

Jean Girder, wife of the cooper — Sir W Scott, Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III)

Girdle (Armi'da's), a cestus worn by Armi'da, which, like that of Venns, possessed the magical charm of provoking irresistible love — Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1576)

Girdle (Florimel's), the prize of a grand tournament, in which sir Sat'yrane (3 syl), sir Brianor, sir Sanglier, sir Art'egal, sir Cambel, sir Tri'amond, Brit'omart, and others took part. It was accidentally dropped by Florimel in her flight (bk. iii. 7, 31), picked up by sir Satyrane, and employed by him for binding the monster which frightened Florimel to flight, but afterwards came again into sir Satyrane's possession, when he placed it for safety in a golden coffer. It was a gorgeous girdle, made by Vulcan for Venus, and embossed with pearls and precious stones, but its chief merit was

It gave the virtue of chaste love
And wifehood true to all that it did bear;

But whosoever contrary doth prove
Might not the same about her middle wear
But it would loose or also asunder tear
Spenser Fairy Queen lib. 7 (1590)

* * Other tests of chastity were "Arthur's drinking horn," mentioned in the Morte d'Arthur. The "court mantel," mentioned in the ballad called "The Boy and the Mantel," in Percy's Reliques. The "enchanted cup," mentioned in Orlando Furioso, ii, etc

Girdle (Venus's), a girdle on which was embroidered the passions, desires, joys, and pains of love. It was usually called a cestus, which means "embroidered," and was worn lower down than the cin'gulum or matron's girdle, but higher up than the zone or maiden's girdle. It was said to possess the magical power of exciting love. Homer describes it thus

In this was every art and every charm
To win the wisest and the coldest warm
Fond love the gentle vow the gay desire
The kind deceit the still reviving fire
Persuasive speech and more persuasive sighs
Silence that spoke of eloquence of eyes.

Glamorgan, according to British fable, is gla or glyn Morgan (valley or glen of Morgan) Cundah' and Morgan (says Spenser) were sons of Gonorrill and Regan, the two elder daughters of king Leyr. Cundah chased Morgan into Wales, and slew him in the glen which perpetuates his name

Then gan the bloody brethren both to raine
But fierce Cundah gan shortly to enry
His brother Morgan
Raisd warre and him in battell overthrew
Whence as he to those woody hills did fly
Which hight of him Gla morgan there him slew
Spenser Fairy Queen II. 10. 33 (1590)

This is not quite in accordance with Geoffrey's account

Some restless spirits Inspired Morgan with vain conceits, who marched with an army through Cunedagus's country and began to burn all before him but he was met by Cunedagus with all his forces who attacked Morgan, and putting him to flight killed him in a town of Kambria which since his death has been called Morgan to this day — British History II 15 (1142)

Glasgow (The bishop of) — Sir W Scott, Castle Dangerous, xix. (time, Henry I)

Glasgow Arms, an oak tree with a bird above it, and a bell hanging from one of the branches, at the foot of the tree a salmon with a ring in its mouth. The legend is that St Kentigern built the city and hung a bell in an oak tree to summon the men to work. This accounts for the "oak and bell." Now for the rest. A Scottish queen, having formed an illicit attachment to a soldier, presented her paramour with a ring, the gift of her royal husband. Thus coming to the knowledge of the king, he contrived to abstract it from the soldier while he was asleep, threw it into the Clyde, and then asked his queen to show it him. The queen, in great alarm, ran to St Kentigern, and confessed her crime. The father confessor went to the Clyde, drew out a salmon with the ring in its mouth, handed it to the queen, and by this means both prevented a scandal and reformed the repentant lady.

A similar legend is told of Dame Rebecca Berry, wife of Thomas Elton of Stratford Bow, and relict of sir John Berry, 1696. She is the heroine of the ballad called The Cruel Knight. The story runs thus. A knight, passing by a cottage, heard the cries of a woman in labour. By his knowledge of the occult sciences, he knew that the infant was doomed to be his future wife, but he determined to elude his destiny. When the child was of a marriageable age, he took her to the sea-side, intending to drown her, but relented, and, throwing a ring into the sea, commanded her never to see his face again, upon pain of death, till she brought back that ring with her. The damsel now went as cook to a noble family, and one day, as she was preparing a cod-fish for dinner, she found the ring in the fish, took it to the knight, and thus became the bride of sir John Berry. The Berry arms show a fish, and in the dexter chief a ring.

Glass (Mrs), a tobacconist, in London, who befriended Jeanie Deans while she sojourned in town, whither she had come to crave pardon from the queen for Effie Deans, her half-sister, lying under sentence of death for the murder of her infant born before wedlock — Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Glass Armour. When Chery went to encounter the dragon that guarded the singing apple, he arrayed himself in glass armour, which reflected objects like a mirror. Consequently, when the monster came against him, seeing its reflection in every part of the armour, it fancied hundreds of dragons were coming against it, and ran away in alarm into a cave, which Chery instantly closed up, and thus became master of the situation — Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Glastonbury, in Arthurian romance, was the burial-place of king Arthur. Selden, in his Illustrations of Drayton, gives an account of Arthur's tomb "betwixt two pillars," and says that "Henry II gave command to Henry de Bois (then abbot of Glastonbury) to make great search for the body of the British king, which was found in a wooden coffin some 16 foote deepe, and afterwards they found a stone on whose lower side was fixed a leaden cross with the name inscribed."

Godfrey (Miss), an heiress, daughter of an Indian governor.—Sam Foote, The Lion (1761).

Godínez (Doctor), a schoolmaster, "the most expert slogger in Oviedo" [Oreca'do]. He taught Gil Blas, and "in six years his worthy pupil understood a little Greek, and was a tolerable Latin scholar"—Lesage, Gil Blas, I (1715).

Godíva or Godgifu, wife of earl Leofric. The tale is that she begged her husband to remit a certain tax which oppressed the people of Coventry. Leofric said he would do so only on one condition—that she would ride naked through the city at midday. So the lady gave orders that all people should shut up their windows and doors, and she rode naked through the town, and delivered the people from the tax. The tale further says that all the people did as the lady bade them except Peeping Tom, who looked out, and was struck blind.

 This legend is told at length by Drayton in his Polyolbion, xiii (1613).

Godless Florins, English two-shilling pieces issued by Shiel, when master of the mint. He was a Roman Catholic, and left out I D (defender of the faith) from the legend. They were issued and called in the same year (1819).

Godmanchester Hogs and Huntingdon Sturgeon.

During a very high flood in the meadows between Huntingdon and Godmanchester something was seen floating which the Godmanchester people thought was a black hog and the Huntingdon folk declared was a sturgeon. When rescued from the waters it proved to be a young donkey.—Lord Braybrooke (1813) Diary May 2nd 166th.

Godmer, a British giant, son of Albion, slain by Canutus one of the companions of Brute.

Three monstrous stones
Which that huge son of hideous Albion
Great Godmer threw in fierce contention
At bold Canutus but of him was slain
Spenser Faery Queen II 10 (1590).

Goemot or Goemagot, a British giant, twelve cubits high, and of such prodigious strength that he could pull up a full-grown oak at one tug. Same as Gogmagog (q v.)

On a certain day, when Brutus was holding a solemn festival to the gods, this giant with twenty more of his companions, came in upon the Britons, among whom he made a dreadful slaughter. But the Britons at last killed them every one but Goemagot. Him Brutus preserved alive out of a desire to see a combat between the giant and Corineus, who took delight in such encounters. Corineus carried him to the top of a high rock and tossed him into the sea.—Geoffrey British History I. 16 (114).

Goemagot's Leap or "Lam Goemagot," now called Haw, near Plymouth, the place where the giant fell when Cornutus (3 syl.) tossed him down the craggy rocks, by which he was mangled to pieces.—Geoffrey, British History, I 16 (1142).

 Southey calls the word Lan-gw-māgog (See GOEMAGOT).

Goer'vyl, sister of prince Madoc, and daughter of Owen late king of North Wales. She accompanied her brother to America, and formed one of the colony of Caer-madoc, south of the Missouri (twelfth century).—Southey, Madoc (1805).

Goetz von Berlichingen, or Gottfried of the Iron Hand, a famous German burgrave, who lost his right hand at the siege of Landshut. The iron hand which replaced the one he had lost is still shown at Jaxthausen, the place of his birth. Gottfried took a prominent part in the wars of independence against the electors of Brandenburg and Bavaria, in the sixteenth century (1480-1562).

* * Goethe has made this the title and subject of an historical drama

Goffe (Captain), captain of the pirate vessel—Sir W Scott, The Pirate (time, William III)

Gog, according to Ezekiel xxxviii, xxxix, was "prince of Magog" (a country or people). Calmet says Cambyses king of Persia is meant, but others think Antiochus Epiphanes is alluded to Gog, in Rev xv 7-9, means Antichrist. Gog and Magog in conjunction, mean all princes of the earth who are enemies of the Christian Church

* * Sale says Gog is a Turkish tribe—Al Koran, xviii note

Gog and Magog. Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople, speaks of Gog and Magog as two separate nations tributary to him. These, with thirteen others, he says, are now shut up behind inaccessible mountains, but at the end of the world they will be let loose, and overrun the whole earth—Albericus Truism Fontium, Chronicles (1242)

Salé tells us that Gog and Magog are called by the Arabs "Yajuj" and "Majuj," which are two nations or tribes descended from Japhet, son of Noah. Gog, according to some authorities, is a Turkish tribe, and Magog is the tribe called "Gilan" by Ptolemy, and "Geli" or "Gelæ" by Strabo—Al Koran, xviii note

Respecting the re-appearance of Gog and Magog, the Koran says "They [the dead] shall not return till Gog and Magog have a passage opened for them, and then [the dead] shall hasten from every high hill," i.e. the resurrection (ch. xxv)

Gog and Magog. The two statues of Guildhall so called are in reality the statues of Gogmagog or Goemagot and Corneus, referred to in the next article (See also CORINUS). The Albion giant is known by his pole-axe and spiked ball. Two statues so called stood on the same spot in the reign of Henry V, but those now seen were made by Richard Sanders, in 1708, and are fourteen feet in height.

In Homer's time, children and country visitors were to see every day when the giants heard the clock strike twelve, they came down to dinner—Old and New London, i. 357

Another tale was that they then fell foul of each other in angry combat

Gog'magog, king of the Albion giants, eighteen feet in height, killed by Corin in a wrestling match, and hung by him over the Hoe or Haw of Plymouth. For this achievement, Brute gave his follower all that horn of land now called Cornwall, Cor'n[w]all, a contraction of Corin-wall. The contest is described by Dryden in his Polyolbion, i (1612)

Even thus unmoved
Stood Corineus the sire of Guendolen
When grappling with his monstrous enemy
He the brute vastness held aloft, and bore
And headlong hurled, all shattered to the sea,
Down from the rock's high summit, since that day
Called Lan gema gog

Southey Joan of Arc viii. 235

Spenser throws the accent of Corneus on the second syllable, Southey on the first, while Dryden makes it a word of four syllables, and accents the third

Gog'magog Hill, the higher of the two hills some three miles south-east of Cambridge. It once belonged to the Bulsham Hills, but, "being rude and barren, regarding neither God nor man," it was named in reproach Gogmagog. The legend is that this Gogmagog Hill was once a huge giant, who fell in love with the nymph Granta, and, meeting her alone, told her all his heart, saying

Sweetest mine! if thou mine own wilt be—
I've many a pretty quid I keep in store for thee
A nest of broad faced owls, and goodly urchins too
(Nay nymph take heed of me when I begin to woo)
And better far than that a balchin two years old
And curled as a calf it is, and oft could have been sold
And yet besides all this, I've goodly bear whelps twain
Full dainty for my joy when she's disposed to play
And twenty sows of lead to make our wedding ring "

but the saucy nymph only mocked the giant, and told his love story to the Muses, and all made him their jest and sport and laughter—Dryden, Polyolbion, xxi (1622)

Goutre

When we were boys
Who would believe that there were mountaineers
Dew lapped like bull, whose throats had hanging at em
Wallets of flesh?
Shakespeare The Tempest act III. sc. 3 (1607)

Gold of Nibelungen (The), unlucky wealth. "To have the gold of Nibelungen" is to have a possession which seems to bring a curse with it. The uncle who murdered "the babes in the wood" for their estates and money, got the "gold of Nibelungen," nothing from that moment went well with him—his cattle died, his crops failed, his barns were destroyed by fire or tempest, and he was reduced to utter ruin (See NIBELUNGEN)—Icelandic Edda

Gold of Tolosa (The), ill guns, which never prosper. The reference is to Cæpio the Roman consul, who, on his march to Gallia Narbonensis, stole from Tolosa (Toulouse) the gold and silver consecrated by the Cimbrian Druids to their gods. He was utterly defeated by the Cimbrians, and some 112,000 Romans were left dead on the field of battle (106)

Gold Poured down the Throat Marcus Licinius Crassus, surnamed "The Rich," one of the first Roman triumvirate, tried to make himself master of Parthia, but being defeated and brought captive to Orodes king of Parthia, he was put to death by having molten gold poured down his throat. "Sate thy greed with this," said Orodes.

Manlius Nepos Aquilinus tried to restore the kings of Bithynia and Cappadocia, dethroned by Mithridates, but being unsuccessful and made prisoner, he was put to death by Mithridates by molten gold poured down his throat.

In hell, the avaricious are punished in the same way, according to the Shepherd's Calendar.

And ladles full of melted gold
Were poured adown their throats.
The Dead Man's Song (1570)

Goldemar (King), a house-spirit, sometimes called king Vollmar. He lived three years with Neveling von Hardenberg, on the Hardenstein at the Ruhr, and the chamber in which he lived is still called Vollmar's chamber. This house-spirit, though sensible to the touch, was invisible. It played beautifully on the harp, talked freely, revealed secrets, and played dice. One day, a person determined to discover its whereabouts, but Goldemar cut him to pieces and cooked the different parts. Never after this was there any trace of the spirit. The roasted fragments disappeared in the Lorrain war in 1651, but the pot in which the man's head was boiled was built into the kitchen wall of Neveling von Hardenberg, where it remains to this day.—Von Steinen, German Mythology, 477.

Golden Ass (The), a romance in Latin by Apuleius (5 syl). It is the adventures of Lucian, a young man who had been transformed into an ass but still retained his human consciousness. It tells us the series which he suffered at the hands of robbers, cannibals, magistrates, and so on, till the time came for him to resume his proper form. It is full of wit, race, humour, and rich fancy, and contains the exquisite episode of "And Psyche (bks iv, v, vi)

(This very famous satire, together with the Asinus of Lucian, was founded on a satire of the same name by Lucius of Patra, and has been imitated in modern times by Niccolò Machiavelli, T. Taylor, in 1822, published a translation of the Aureus Asinus, and Sir G. Head, in 1851. Lafontaine has an imitation of the episode, and Mrs. Tighe turned it into Spenserian verse in 1805.)

* * Boccaccio has borrowed largely from The Golden Ass, and the incidents of the robbers in Gil Blas are taken from it.

Golden Dragon of Bruges (The) The golden dragon was taken in one of the crusades from the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, and placed on the belfry of Bruges, but Philip van Artevelde (2 syl) transported it to Ghent, where it still adorns the belfry.

Saw great Artevelde victorious scale the Golden Dragon's nest.

Longfellow The Belfry of Bruges

Golden Fleece (The), the fleece of the ram which transported Phryxos to Colchis. When Phryxos arrived there, he sacrificed the ram and gave the fleece to king Æetes, who hung it on a sacred oak. It was stolen by Jason, in his "Argonautic expedition."

The Golden Fleece of the North. Fur and peltry of Siberia is so called.

Golden Fountain (The), a fountain which in twenty-four hours would convert any metal or mineral into gold.—R. Johnson, The Seven Champions of Christendom, ii 4 (1617).

Golden Gate of Constantinople, added by Theodosius to Constantine's wall. It consists of a triumphal arch, surmounted with a bronze statue of Victory. The gate is amply decorated with gilt ornaments and inscriptions.—See Count Robert of Paris, ii, by Sir W. Scott.

Golden Horn (The), the inlet of the Bosphorus on which Constantinople stands, so called from its shape and beauty.

Golden Legends (The), a collection of hagiology, made in the thirteenth century by James de Voragine, a Dominican. The legends consist of 177 sections, each of which is devoted to a particular saint or festival, arranged in the order of the calendar.

Goltho, the friend of Ul'noze (3 syl) He was in love with Birtha, daughter of lord As'tragon the sage, but Birtha loved the duke Gondibert The tale being unfinished, the sequel of Goltho is not known—Sir William Davenant, Gondibert (died 1668)

Gomer or Godmer, a British giant, slain by Canut's one of the companions of Brute (See GOMOR)

Since Gomer's giant brood inhabited this isle.
Dryden Polyolbion, xiv (1613)

Gomez, a rich banker, 60 years of age, married to Elvira, a young wife he is mean, covetous, and jealous Elvira has a liaison with colonel Lorenzo, which Dominick, her father confessor, aids and abets, but the amour is constantly thwarted, and it turns out that Lorenzo and Elvira are brother and sister — Dryden, The Spanish Fryar (1680)

Gondibert (Duke), of the royal line of Lombardy. Prince Oswald of Verona, out of jealousy, stirs up a faction fight against him, which is limited by agreement to four combatants on each side. Oswald is slain by Gondibert, and Gondibert is cured of his wounds by lord As'tragon, a philosopher and sage Rhodolind, the only child of Aribert king of Lombardy, is in love with Gondibert, and Aribert hopes that he will become his son-in-law and heir, but Gondibert is betrothed to BIRTHA. One day, while walking with his affianced BIRTHA, a messenger from the king comes post haste to tell him that Aribert had publicly proclaimed him his heir, and that Rhodolind was to be his bride. Gondibert still told BIRTHA he would remain true to her, and gave her an emerald ring, which would turn pale if his love declined. As the tale was never finished, the sequel cannot be given — Sir W. Davenant, Gondibert (died 1668)

Goneril, eldest daughter of King Lear, and wife of the duke of Albany. She treated her aged father with such scant courtesy, that he could not live under her roof, and she induced her sister Regan to follow her example. Subsequently, both the sisters fell in love with Edmund, natural son of the earl of Gloucester, whom Regan designed to marry when she became a widow. Goneril, out of jealousy, now poisoned her sister, and "after slew herself." Her name is proverbial for "filial ingratitude" — Shakespeare, King Lear (1605)

Gonin, a buffoon of the sixteenth century, who acquired great renown for his clever tricks, and gave rise to the French phrase, Un tour de maitre Gonin ("a trick of Master Gonin's")

Gonnella, domestic jester to the margrave Nicolo d Este, and to his son

Borso duke of Ferrara. The horse he rode on was ossa atque pelvis totus, and, like Rosinante, has become proverbial. Gonnella's jests were printed in 1506

Gonsalez [Gonzalez], Fernan Gonsalez or Gonsalvo, a Spanish hero of the tenth century, whose life was twice saved by his wife Sancha. His adventures have given birth to a host of ballads

(There was a Hernandez Gonsalvo of Cordoba, called "The Great Captain" (1443-1515), to whom some of the ballads refer, and this is the hero of Florian's historical novel entitled Gonzalez de Cordoue (1791), borrowed from the Spanish romance called The Civil Wars of Granada, by Gines Perez de la Hita)

Good Hope (Cape of) When Bartholomew Diaz first discovered this cape, in 1497, he called it "The Cape of Storms" (Cabo Tormentoso), but John II king of Portugal changed the name to that of "Good Hope"

The Luxine Sea (i.e. "the hospitable sea") was first called "The Axine Sea" ("the inhospitable"), from the terror with which it was viewed by the early Greeks, but it was subsequently called by the more courteous name. However, the older name is the one which now generally prevails, thus we call it in English "The Black Sea," and the Turks, Greeks, and Russians call it inhospitable, and not hospitable

Good Man (A) Count Cassel says, "In Italy a good man means a religious one, in France a cheerful one, in Spain a wise one, and in England a rich one" — Inebald, Lovers' Vows, ii 2 (1800)

Good Regent (The), James Stuart, earl of Murray, regent of Scotland after the imprisonment of queen Mary. (Born 1533, regent 1567, assassinated 1570)

Goodfellow (Robin), son of king Oberon. When six years old, he was so mischievous that his mother threatened to whip him, and he ran away, but falling asleep, his father told him he should have anything he wished for, with power to turn himself into any shape, so long as he did harm to none but knaves and queans.

His first exploit was to turn himself into a horse to punish a churl whom he conveyed into a great plash of water and left there, laughing as he flew off. "Ho ho ho!" He afterwards went to a farm house and taking a fancy to the maid does her work during the night. The maid watching him and observing him rather bare of clothes, provides him with garments, which he puts out laughing. "Ho, ho ho!" He next changes himself into a Will-o-the-wisp to mislead a party of merry makers and having misled them all night, he left them at daybreak with a "Ho ho ho!" At another time seeing a fellow ill using a maiden he changed himself into a hare ran between his legs and then growing into a horse tossed him into a hedge laughing. "Ho ho ho!"—The Mad Pranks and Merry Jest of Robin Goodfellow (1590) (Perry Society 1841)

Goodfellow (Robin), a general name for any domestic spirit, as imp, urehin, elve, hag, fay, Kit-wi'-the-can'stick, spook, man-i'-the-oak, Puek, hobgoblin, Tom-tumbler, bug, bogie, Jack-o'-lantern, Triar's lantern, Will-o'-the-wisp, Ariel, nixie, kelpie, etc., etc.

A bigger knave than these German kobolds is that called by us Robin Goodfellows, that would in those superstitious times grind corn for a mess of milk, cut wood or do any manner of drudgery work. There have several names but we commonly call them Pueks.—Burton Anatomy of Melancholy 47

* * The Goodfellows, being very numerous, can hardly be the same as Robin son of Oberon, but seem to obtain the name because their character was similar, and, indeed, Oberon's son must be included in the generic name.

Goodman of Ballengerich, the assumed name of James V of Scotland when he made his disguised visits through the districts round Edinburgh and Stirling.

* * Haroun-al-Raschid, Louis XI, Peter "the Great," etc., made similar visits in disguise, for the sake of obtaining information by personal inspection.

Goodman's Fields, Whitechapel, London. So called from a large farmer of the name of Goodman.

At this farm I myself in my youth have fetched many a ha porth of milk, and never had less than three plopts in summer and one in winter. Always hot from the line and strained. Ooe Trolop and afterwards Goodman was the farmer there and had thirty or forty kine to the pail.—Stow Survey of London (1598).

Goodman Grist, the miller, a friend of the smugglers.—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Goodricke (Mr), a catholic priest at Middlemas.—Sir W Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.)

Goodsire (Johnnie), a weaver, near Charles's Hope farm.—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II.)

Goodwill, a man who had acquired £10,000 by trade, and wished to give his daughter Lucy in marriage to one of his relations, in order to keep the money in the family, but Lucy would not have any one of the boobies, and made choice instead of a strapping footman. Goodwill had the good sense to approve of the choice.—Fielding, The Virgin Unmasked.

Goody Blake, a poor old woman detected by Harry Gill picking up sticks from his farm-land. The farmer compelled her to leave them, and threatened to punish her for trespass. Goody Blake turned on the lusty yeoman, and said never from that moment should he know the blessing of warmth, and sure enough, neither clothing, fire, nor summer sun ever did make him warm again.

No word to any man he utters,
A bed or up to young or old
But ever to him-elf he mutters,
Poor Harry Gill is very cold."

Wordsworth Goody Blake and Harry Gill (1795)

Goody Palsgrave, a name of contempt given to Frederick V elector palatine. He is also called the "Snow King" and the "Winter King," because the protestants made him king of Bohemia in the autumn of 1619, and he was set aside in the autumn of 1620.

Goody Two-shoes, a nursery tale by Oliver Goldsmith, written in 1765 for Newbery, St Paul's Churchyard. The second title is Mrs Margery Two-shoes.

Goose Gibbie, a half-witted lad, first entrusted to "keep the turkeys," but afterwards "advanced to the more important office of minding the cows"—Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II.)

Goosey Goderich, Frederick Robinson, created viscount Goderich in 1827. So called by Cobbett, for his incapacity as a statesman (premier 1827-1828).

Gorboduc, GORBODUG, or GORBOGUD, a mythical British king, who had two sons (Ferrex and Porrex). Ferrex was driven by his brother out of the kingdom, and on attempting to return with a large army, was defeated by him and slain Soon afterwards, Porrex himself was murdered in his bed by his own mother, Widen, who loved Ferrex the better — Geoffrey, British History, ii 16 (1142).

And Gorboduc till far in years he grew
When his ambitious sonnes unto them tryvne
A taught the rule and from their father drew Stout Ferrex and stout Porrex him in prison threw

But oh! the greedy thirst of royall crowne
Stird Porrex up to put his brother downe

209.

Gorboduc, the first historical play in the language The first three acts by Thomas Norton, and the last two by Thomas Sackville afterwards lord Buckhurst (1562) It is further remarkable as being the father of Iambic ten-syllable blank verse

Those who last did tug
In worse than civil war the sons of Gorboduc.
Drayton Polyolbon, viii (1612)

Gor'brias, lord-protector of Iberia, and father of king Arba'ces (3 syl) — Beaumont and Fletcher, A King or No King (1611)

Gor'dius, a Phrygian peasant, chosen by the Phrygians for their king He consecrated to Jupiter his wagon, and tied the yoke to the draught-tree so artfully that the ends of the cord could not be discovered A rumour spread abroad that he who untied this knot would be king of Asia, and when Alexander the Great was shown it, he cut it with his sword, saying, "It is thus we loose our knots"

Gordon (The Rev Mr.), chaplain in Cromwell's troop — Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Gordon (Lord George), leader of the "No Popery riots" of 1779 Half mad, but really well-intentioned, he countenanced the most revolting deeds, urged on by his secretary Gresham Lord George Gordon died in jail, 1793 — C Dielens, Barnaby Rudge (1841)

Goidomus or Gordon (Bernard), a noted physician of the thirteenth century in the Rouergue (France), author of Liber Medicinæ, de Morborum prope Omnium Curatione, septem Particulis Distributum (Naples, 1480)

And his Goidomus the divine "
In his famous Life of Medicine
No remedy potent enough to restore you!
Longfellow, The Golden Legend.

Gor'gibus, an honest, simple-minded citizen of middle life, father of Madelon and uncle of Cathos The two girls have had their heads turned by novels, but are taught by a harmless trick to discern between the easy manners of a gentleman and the vulgar pretensions of a lackey — Molière, Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659)

Gorgibus, father of Célie He is a headstrong, unreasonable old man, who tells his daughter that she is for ever reading novels, and filling her mind with ridiculous notions about love "Vous parlez de Dien bien moins que de Lélié," he says, and insists on her giving up Lélié for Valère, saying, "S'il ne l'est aimant, il le sera marié," and adds, "L'amour est souvent un fruit du mariage"

Jetez moi dans le feu tous ces méchants écrits [i.e. romances]
Qui gâtent tous les jours tant de jeunes esprits

Molière, op. cit. (1660)

Gor'lois (3 syl), said by some to be the father of king Arthur He was lord of Tintag'el Castle, in Cornwall, his wife was Igrayne (3 syl) or Igerna, and one of his daughters (Bellicent) was, according to some authorities, the wife of Lot king of Orkney

* * Gorlois was not the father of Arthur, although his wife (Igerna or Igrayne) was his mother

Then all the kings asked Merlin For what cause is that beardless boy Arthur made king? Sirs "said Merlin because he is King Uther's son, born in wellock More than three hours after the death of Gorlois, did the king wed the fair Igrayne." — Malory History of Prince Arthur i 6 (1470)

[Uther] was sorry for the death of Gorlois, but rejoiced that Igerna was now at liberty to marry again; they continued to live together with much affection and had a son and daughter whose names were Arthur and Anne — Geoffrey British History iii 20 (114)

* * It is quite impossible to reconcile the contradictory accounts of Arthur's sister and Lot's wife Tennyson says Bellicent, but the tales compiled by Sir T Malory all give Margause Thus in La Mort d'Arthur, i 2, we read "King Lot of Lothian and of Orkney wedded Margause [Arthur's sister]" (pt 1 36), "whose sons were Gawaine, Agravaine, Gaheris, and Gareth," but Tennyson says Gareth was "the last tall son of Lot and Bellicent"

Gowk Storm, a short storm, such as occurs in spring, when the gowk or cuckoo comes

He trusted the present [disturbance] would prove but a gowk storm — Sir W Scott, Tales of a Grandfather 49

Gowk-thrapple (Maister), a cozening preacher — Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

A man of coarse mechanical perhaps rather intrinsically feeble intellect with the vehemence of some pulpit drumming Gowk thrapple — Carlyle

Graaf (Count) was a great speculator in corn One year a sad famine prevailed, and he expected, like Pharaoh king of Egypt, to make an enormous fortune by his speculation, but an army of rats, pressed by hunger, invaded his barns, and then swarming into the castle, fell on the old baron, worried him to death, and then devoured him. (See HATTO)

Graal (Saint) or ST GREAL is generally said to be the vessel or platter used by Christ at the last supper, in which Joseph of Arimathea caught the blood of the crucified Christ. In all descriptions of it in the Arthurian romances, it is simply the visible "presence" of Christ, or realization of the papistic notion that the wafer, after consecration, is changed into the very body of the Saviour, and when sir Galahad "achieved the quest of the holy graal," all that is meant is that he saw with his bodily eyes the visible Saviour into which the holy wafer had been transmuted.

Then the bishop took a wafer which was made in the likeness of bread and at the lifting up [the elevation of the host] there came a figure in the likeness of a child and the visage was as red and as bright as fire and he smote himself into that bread so they saw that the bread was formed of a fleshly man and then he put it into the holy vessel again then [the bishop] took the holy vessel and came to sir Galahad as he knelted down and there he received his Saviour.—Pt. III. 101, 102.

King Pelles and sir Launcelot caught a sight of the St Graal, but did not "achieve it," like Galahad.

Sanegraal which is here seen —Pt. III.

When sir Bors de Ganis went to Corbin, and saw Galahad the son of sir Launcelot, he prayed that the boy might prove as good a knight as his father, and instantly the white dove came with the golden censer, and the damsel bearing the sanegraal, and told sir Bors that Galahad would prove a better knight than his father, and would "achieve the Sanegraal," then both dove and damsel vanished.—Pt. III. 4.

Sir Percival, the son of sir Pellinore king of Wales, after his combat with sir Ector de Maris (brother of sir Launcelot) caught a sight of the holy graal, and both were cured of their wounds thereby. Like sir Bors, he was with sir Galahad when the quest was achieved (pt. III. 14). Sir Launcelot was also miraculously cured in the same way (pt. III. 18).

King Arthur, the queen, and all the 150 knights saw the holy graal as they sat at supper when Galahad was received into the fellowship of the Round Table.

And they heard a crackling and crying of thunder and in the midst of the blast entered a sun beam more clear by seven times than ever they saw day and all were lighted of the grace of the Holy Ghost then there entered the hall the holy graal [consecrated bread], covered with white samite but none might see it, nor who bare it and when the holy graal had been borne thro the hall, the vessel suddenly departed.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, III. 35 (1470).

* * The chief romances of the St Graal are The Holy Graal, in verse (1100), by the old German minnesingers Isiurel or the Guardian of the Holy Graal, by Wolfram a minnesinger The Romance of Parzival, by Wolfram, translated into French by Chrétien de Troyes, in verse (1170), it contains 4018 eight-syllable lines Roman des dñerses Quêtes des St Graal, by Walter Mapes, in prose, this is a continuation of the Roman de Tristan The Life of Joseph of Arimathea, in prose, by Robert de Borron The Holy Graal, by Tennyson.

Hellandus says 'In French they give the name gradal or grail to a large deepish vessel in which rich meats with their gravy are served to the wealthy'—Incentius Belloracensis Speculum Hist., xxiii. 147.

We find in the churchwardens' account of Wing (Bucks.), 1527 "Three Graylls," i.e. three gradales, called by the Roman Catholics cantatoria. In the Athenæum (June 25, 1870) we read "The Saxons called a graal a 'graduale' ad te lesavi, from the first three words of the introit (First Sunday in Advent), with which the codex begins."

Graal-burg, a magnificent temple, surrounded with towers raised on brazen pillars, and containing the holy graal. It was founded by king Isiurel, on mount Salvage, in Spain, and was a marvel of magnificence, glittering with gold and precious stones.—Wolfram of Eschenbach (minnesinger), Parzival (thirteenth century).

Grace (Lady), sister of lady Townly, and the engaged wife of Mr Manly. The very opposite of a lady of fashion. She says

In summer I could pass my leisure hours in reading walking or sitting under a green tree in dressing, dining chatting with no agreeable friend, perhaps hearing a little music taking a dish of tea, or a game at cards managing my family looking into its accounts, playing with my children or in a thousand other innocent amusements.—Vaughan and Gibber The Frolicked Husband III. (1725).

No person "says George Colman has ever more successfully performed the elegant levities of lady Townly upon the stage, or more happily practised the available virtues of lady Grace in the circles of society than Miss Farren (the countess of Derby 1769-1829)."

Grace-be-here Humgudgeon, a corporal in Cromwell's troop.—Sir W. Scott Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Grace was in all Her Steps
Adam says of Eve

Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eye
In every gait are dignity and love.
Milton Paradise Lost viii. 453, etc. (1667)

Grace'church, London, means the grass or grass church. It was built on the site of the old grass-market

Gracio'sa, a lovely princess, who is the object of a step-mother's most implacable hatred. The step-mother's name is Grognon, and the tale shows how all her malicious plots are thwarted by Percinet, a fairy prince, in love with Graciola

Gracio'so, the heeased fool of Spanish drama. He has his cockcomb and truncheon, and mingles with the actors without aiding or abetting the plot. Sometimes he transfers his gibes from the actors to the audience, like our circus clowns

Gradas'so, king of Seneca'na, "bravest of the pagan knights." He went against Charlemagne with 100,000 vassals in his train, "all discredited kings," who never addressed him but on their knees—Bojardo, Orlando Innamorato (1495), Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Grad'grind (Thomas), a man of facts and realities. Everything about him is square, his forehead is square, and so is his fore-finger, with which he emphasizes all he says. Formerly he was in the wholesale hardware line. In his greatness he becomes M P for Cock-town, and he lives at Stone Lodge, a mile or so from town. He prides himself on being eminently practical, and though not a bad man at heart, he blights his children by his hard, practical way of bringing them up.

Mrs Gradgrind, wife of Thomas Gradgrind. A little thin woman, always taking physic, without receiving from it any benefit. She looks like an indifferently executed transparency without light enough behind the figure. She is always complaining, always peevish, and dies soon after the marriage of her daughter Louisa.

Tom Gradgrind, son of the above, a fullen young man, much loved by his sister, and holding an office in the bank of his brother-in-law, Josiah Bounderby. Tom robs the bank, and throws suspicion on Stephen Blackbridge, one of the hands in Bounderby's factory. When found out, Tom takes refuge in the circus of the town, disguised as a black servant, till he effects his escape from England.

Louisa Gradgrind, eldest daughter of Thomas Gradgrind, M P. She marries Josiah Bounderby, banker and mill-owner. Louisa has been so hardened by her bringing up, that she appears cold and indifferent to everything, but she dearly loves her brother Tom—C Dickens, Hard Times (1854).

Græme (Roland), heir of Avenel (2 syl). He first appears as page to the lady of Avenel, then as page to Mary queen of Scots.

Magdalen Græme, dame of Heather-gill, grandmother of Roland Græme. She appears to Roland disguised as Mother Kneeven, an old witch at Kiuross—Sir W Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Græme (William), the red river [sic] boatman at Westburnflat—Sir W Scott, The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Grævius or J G Græve of Saxony, editor of several of the Latin classics (1632-1703).

It seems to me I have more satisfaction in beholding you than I should have in conversing with Cælius and Gronovius—Mrs Cowley to the Duke of 2.

(Abraham Gronovius was a famous philologist, 1691-1775.)

Græhame (Colonel John), of Claverhouse, in the royal army under the duke of Monmouth. Afterwards viscount of Dundee.

Cornet Richard Græhame, the colonel's nephew, in the same army—Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II).

Græhame's Dike, the Roman wall between the firths of the Clyde and Forth.

This wall defended the Britons for a time, but the Scots and Picts climbed over it. A man named Græhame is said to have been the first soldier who got over, and the common people still call the remains of the wall Græhame's Dike—Sir W Scott Tales of a Grandfather.

Græhams, nicknamed "Of the Hen." The reference is to the Græhams, having provided for a great marriage feast, found that a raid had been made upon their poultry by Donald of the Hammer (q v.). They went in pursuit, and a combat took place, but as the fight was for "cocks and hens," it obtained for the Græhams the nickname of Græmoach an Garrioh.

Gram, Siegfried's sword.

Grammar Sigismund, surnamed Augustus, said, "I go sum imperator

Romanorum, et supra grammaticam" (1520, 1548-1572)

Grammarians (Prince of), Apollonius of Alexandria Priscian called him Grammaticorum Princeps (second century a c)

Grammont (The count of) He promised marriage to la belle Hamilton, but left England without performing the promise, whereupon the brothers followed him, and asked him if he had not forgotten something "True, true," said the count, "excuse my short memory," and, returning with the brothers, he made the young lady countess of Grammont

Grand Pendu (Le), in cards, the king of diamonds Whoever draws this card in cartomancy, is destined to die by the hands of the executioner (See LE-NORMAND)

Joachim Murat, when King of Naples sought the aid of Mlle. Lehmann by whom he was received with her customary haughtiness. The cards being produced Murat cut the Grand Pendu the portent of ill fortune Murat cut four times and in every instance it was the king of diamonds.—See W H Wiltshire Playing and other Cards 162

(The card called le pendu in tarot cards is represented by a man with his hands tied behind his back, and in some cases with two bags of money attached to his armpits The man is hanging by the right leg to a gibbet Probably an emblematic figure in alchemy)

Grand Pré, a village of Acadia (now Nova Scotia), inhabited by a colony from Normandy, of very primitive manners, preserving the very costume of their old Norman forefathers They had no locks to their doors nor bolts to their windows There "the richest man was poor, and the poorest lived in abundance" Grand Pré is the scene of Longfellow's Evangeline (1819)

Grandison (Sir Charles), the hero of a novel by S Richardson, entitled Story of Sir Charles Grandison

Sir Charles is the beau-ideal of a perfect hero, the union of a good Christian and perfect English gentleman, but such a "faultless monster the world ne'er saw" Richardson's ideal of this character was Robert Nolsen, reputed author of the Whole Duty of Man (1753)

Like the old lady mentioned by Sir Walter Scott who chose Sir Charles Grandison because she could go to sleep for half an hour at any time during its reading and still find the personages just where she left them conversing in the cedar parlour—Envy's Gift Art Romance

Grandison is the English Emile but an Emile completely instructed and his actions are c his affection—Edith 1 72

Grandmother Lord Byron calls the British Review "My Grandmother's Review," and says he purchased its favourable criticism of Don Juan with a bribe

For fear some prudish readers should grow skittish I've bribed My Grandmother's Review "The British" I sent it in a letter to the editor Who thanked me duly by return of post And if my gentle Muse be please to roast All I can say is—that he had the money Byron Don Juan, l 209 210 (1819)

Giane (2 syl), Siegfried's horse, whose speed outstripped the wind

Granger (Captain), in love with Elizabeth Doiley, daughter of a retired sloop-seller The old father resolves to give her to the best scholar, himself being judge Gradius, an Oxford pedant, quotes two lines of Greek, in which the word panta occurs four times "Pantry!" cries old Doiley, "no, no, you can't persuade me that's Greek." The captain talks of "refulgent scintillations in the ambient void opike, chrysalis spheroids, and astisfarous constellations," and when Gradius says, "It is a rant in English," the old man boils with indignation "Zounds!" says he, "d'y'e take me for a fool? D'y'e think I don't know my own mother tongue? 'Twas no more like English than I am like Whittington's cat!" and he drives off Gradius as a vile impostor—Mrs Cowley, Who's the Dupe?

Granger (See LOITH)

Grangousier, father of Gargantua, "a good sort of a fellow in his younger days, and a notable jester He loved to drink neat, and would eat salt meat" (bk 1 3) He married Gargamelle (3 syl), daughter of the king of the Par-paillons, and had a son named Gargantua—Rabelais, Gargantua, 1 3 (1533).

* * "Grangonier" is meant for John d Albret, king of Navarre, "Gargamelle" for Catherine de Foix, queen of Navarre, and "Gargantua" for Henri d'Albret, king of Navarre. Some fancy that "Grangonier" is meant for Louis XII, but this cannot be, inasmuch as he is distinctly called a "heretic for declaiming against the 'unts" (ch. xh.)

Grantam (Misc.), a friend of Miss Godfrey, engaged to Sir James Elliot — Saml Foote, The Liar (1761)

Grantmesnil (Sr Hugh de), one of the knights challengers at the tournament — Sir W. Scott, Iranhoe (time, Richard I)

Grantorto, the personification of rebellion in general, and of the evil genius of the Irish rebellion of 1580 in particular. Grantorto is represented as a huge giant, who withheld from Irina [i.e. Serje or Island] her inheritance. Sir Arldgail [Arthur lord Grey of Wilton], being sent to destroy him, challenged him to single combat, and having felled him to the earth with his sword Chrystor, "rest off his head to ease him of his pain" — Spenser, Fairy Queen, v. 12 (1590)

Grapes of God. Tennyson calls the wine-cup of the eucharist "the chalice of the grapes of God," alluding, of course, to the symbolical character of the sacramental wine, which represents the death-blood of Christ, shed for the redemption of sin

Grapes Painted. Zeuxis of Heraclia painted grapes so admirably that birds flew to them and tried to eat them (See HORSE PATTER)

Therefore the bee did suck the painted flower
And birds of grapes the cunning varnished berries
Sir John Lyly, University of the and, II. (1602).

Grass (Cronos), a grass which gives thore who taste it an irresistible desire for the sea. Glaucus, the Bæotian fisherman, observed that all the fishes which he laid on the grass instantly leaped back into the water, & hereupon he also tasted the grass, and was seized with the same irresistible desire. Leaping into the sea, he became a minor sea-god, with the gift of prophecy

Grass (To give), to neglect knowledge; ourselves vanquished. A Latin phrase, Herum dare aut porrigere — Pliny, Nat Hist, xxii. 4.

Grasshopper (A). What animal is that which avoids every one, is a compound of seven animals, and lives in desolate places?

Paradise answered: It is a grasshopper which has the head of a horse, the neck of an ox, the wings of a dragon, the feet of a camel, the tail of a serpent, the horns of a stag, and the body of a scorpion — "Want Cyprian Orient of Tales (The Four Talismans, 1743)

Graunde Amoure (Sir), walking in a meadow, was told by Jane of a beautiful lady named La belle Pucell, who resided in the Tower of Musyke. He was then conducted by Gouvernance and Grace to the Tower of Doctrine, where he received instruction from the seven Sciences — Grammar, Logyke, Rethorike, Arismetrike, Musyke, Geometry, and Astronomy. In the Tower of Musyke he met La belle Pucell, with whom he fell in love, but they parted for a time. Graunde Amoure went to the Tower of Chivalry to perfect himself in the arts of knighthood, and there he received his degree from King Melvynus. He then started on his adventures, and soon encountered False Report, who joined him and told him many a lying tale, but Lady Correction, coming up, had False Report soundly beaten, and the Knight was entertained at her castle. Next day he left, and came to a wall where hung a shield and horn. On blowing the horn, a three-headed monster came forth, with whom he fought, and cut off the three heads, called Falsehood, Iragination, and Perjury. He passed the night in the house of lady Comfort, who attended to his wounds, and next day he slew a giant fifteen feet high and with seven heads. Lastly, he slew the monster Malice, made by enchantment of seven metals. His achievements over, he married La belle Pucell, and lived happily till he was arrested by Age, having for companions Poliove and Avarice. Death came at last to carry him off, and Remembrance wrote his epitaph—Stephen Hawes, The Passc-tyme of Plesure (145)

Graveairs (Lady), a lady of very dubious virtue, in The Careless Husband, by Colley Cibber (1704)

Mrs. Hamilton (1730-1783) upon her entrance was saluted with a storm of hisses, and advancing to the footlights said "Gentlemen and ladies I apolo as how you hiss me because I wouldn't play Lady Gravelairs last night at Mrs. Lellamy's benefit. I would have done so but she said as how my audience stunk and were all tittle people. The pit roared with laughter and the whole house shouted Mrs. Tripel a tittle which the fair speech I'll retaind ever after—Memoir of Mrs Hamilton (1783)

Gray (Old Alice), a former tenant of the Ravenswood family—Sir W. Scott, Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III)

Gray (Dr Gideon), the surgeon at Middlemas

Mrs Gray, the surgeon's wife

Mene Gray, the "surgeon's daughter," taken to India and given to Tippoo Saib as an addition to his harem, but, being rescued by Hyder Ali, was restored to Hartley, after which she returned to her country—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Gray (Duncan) wooed a young lass called Maggie, but as Duncan looked asklent, Maggie "coost her head" and bade Duncan behave himself "Duncan fleeced, and Duncan prived," but Meg was deaf to his pleadings, so Duncan took himself off in dudgeon. This was more than Maggie meant, so she fell sick and like to die. As Duncan "could na be her death," he came forward manfully again, and then "they were crouse [merry] and canty bath. Ha, ha! the wooing o't"—R. Burns, Duncan Gray (1792)

Gray (Mary), daughter of a country gentleman of Perth. When the plague broke out in 1666, Mary Gray and her friend Bessy Bell retired to an unfrequented spot called Burn Bries, where they lived in a secluded cottage and saw no one. A young gentleman brought them food, but he caught the plague, communicated it to the two ladies, and all three died—Allan Ramsay, Bessy Bell and Mary Gray

Gray (Auld Robin) Jennie, a Scotch lass, was loved by young Jamie, "but saving a crown, he had nething else besides." To make that crown a pound, young Jamie went to sea, and both were to be for Jennie. He had not been gone many days when Jennie's mother fell sick, her father broke his arm, and their cow was stolen, then auld Robin came forward and maintained them both. Auld Robin loved the lass, and "wa' tears in his ee," said, "Jennie, for their sakes, oh, marry me!" Jennie's heart said "na," for she looked for Jamie brel, but her father urged her, and the mother pleaded with her eye, and so she consented. They had not been married above a month when Jamie returned. They met, she gave him one kiss, and though she "gang like a ghaist," she made up her mind, like a brave, good lassie, to be a gude wife, for auld Robin was very kind to her (1772)

This ballad was composed by lady Anne Lindsay, daughter of the earl of Balcarres (afterwards lady Barnard). It was written to an old Scotch tune called The Bridegroom Grat when the Sun went Down. Auld Robin Gray was her father's herdsman. When lady Anne was writing the ballad, and was piling distress on Jennie, she told her sister that she had sent Jamie to sea, made the mother sick, and broken the father's arm, but wanted a fourth calamity. "Steal the cow, sister Anne," said the little Elizabeth, and so "the cow was stolen awa'," and the song completed.

Gray's Monument, in Westminster Abbey, was by Bacon.

Graysteel, the sword of Kol, fatal to its owner. It passed into several hands, and always brought ill-luck with it—Icelandic Edda

To play the Greek, to act like a harlot When Cressid says of Helen, "Then she's a merry Greek indeed," she means that Helen is no better than a fille publique Probably Shakespeare had his eye upon "fair Hiren," in Peel's play called The Turkish Mahomet and Hiren the Fair Greek "A fair Greek" was at one time a euphemism for a courtesan

Green (Mr Paddington), clerk at Somerset House

Mrs Paddington Green, his wife — T. M. Morton, If I had a Thousand a Year

Green (Verdant), a young man of infinite simplicity, who goes to college, and is played upon by all the practical jokers of alma mater After he has bought his knowledge by experience, the butt becomes the "butter" of juveniles greener than himself Verdant Green wore spectacles, which won for him the nickname of "Gig-lamps" — (Althbert Bede [Rev Edw Bradley], Verdant Green (1860))

Green (Widow), a rich, buxom dame of 40, who married first for money, and intended to choose her second husband "to please her vanity" She fancied Waller loved her, and meant to make her his wife, but sir William Fondlove was her adorer When the politic widow discovered that Waller had fixed his love on another, she gave her hand to the old beau, sir William, for in the news got wind of her love for Waller, she would become the laughing-stock of all her friends — S. Knowles, The Love-Chase (1837)

Green-Bag Inquiry (The) A green bag full of documents, said to be seditious, was laid before parliament by lord Sidmouth, in 1817 An "inquiry" was made into these documents, and it was deemed advisable to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and forbid all sorts of political meetings likely to be of a seditious character

Green Bird. Martyrs, after death, partake of the delights of bliss in the crops of green birds, which feed on the fruits of paradise — Jallalo'ddin

Green Bud (The), a bird that told one every thing it was asked An oracular bird, obtained by Fairstar after the failure of Chery and her two brothers It was this bird who revealed to the king that Fairstar was his daughter and Chery his nephew — Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Fairstar and Prince Chery," 1682)

Green Hands, inferior sailors, also called "boys," quite irrespective of age A crew is divided into (1) able seamen, (2) ordinary seamen, and (3) green hands or boys, who need know nothing about a ship, not even the name of a single rope

Green Knight (The), sir Pertolope (3 syl), called by Tennyson "Evening Star" or "Hesperus" He was one of the four brothers who kept the passages of Castle Perilous, and was overthrown by sir Gareth — Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 127 (1470), Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette")

* * It is evidently a blunder of Tennyson to call the Green Knight "Evening Star," and the Blue Knight "Morning her, and praised sir Richard for his heroic daring "I have done my duty for my queen and faith," he said, and died. The Spaniards sent the prize home, but a tempest came on, and The Revenge, shot-shattered, "went down, to be lost evermore in the main"—Tennyson, The Revenge, a ballad of the fleet (1878).

Froude has an essay on the subject Canon Kingsley, in Westward Ho! has drawn sir Richard Grenville, and alludes to the fight. Arber published three small volumes on sir Richard's noble exploit. Gervase Markham has a long poem on the subject. Sir Walter Raleigh says "If lord Howard had stood to his guns, the Spanish fleet would have been annihilated." Probably Browning's Heré Riel was present to the mind of Tennyson when he wrote the ballad of The Revenge.

Gresham and the Pearl. When queen Elizabeth visited the Exchange, sir Thomas Gresham pledged her health in a cup of wine containing a precious stone crushed to atoms, and worth £15,000.

Here £15,000 at one clap goes
Instead of sugar Gresham drinks the pearl
Unto his queen and mistress. Pledge it, lords, Heywood, If You Know not Me You Know Nobody

* * It is devoutly to be hoped that sir Thomas was above such absurd vanity, very well for queen Cleopatra, but more than ridiculous in such an imitation.

Gresham and the Grasshopper. There is a vulgar tradition that sir Thomas Gresham was a foundling, and that the old beldame who brought him up was attracted to the spot where she found him, by the loud chirping of a grasshopper.

* * This tale arose from the grasshopper, which forms the crest of sir Thomas.

To Sup with sir Thomas Gresham, to have no supper. Similarly, "to dine with duke Humphrey," is to have nowhere—to dine. The Royal Exchange was at one time a common lounging-place for idlers.

The little coin thy purseless pockets line
Yet with great company thou art taken up
For often with duke Humphrey thou dost dine,
And often with sir Thomas Gresham sup
Hayman Quiddibet (Epigram on a loafer 1693)

Gretchen, a German diminutive of Margaret, the heroine of Goethe's Faust. Faust meets her on her return from church, falls in love with her, and at last seduces her. Overcome with shame, Gretchen destroys the infant to which she gives birth, and is condemned to death. Faust attempts to save her, and, gaining admission to the dungeon, finds her huddled on a bed of straw, singing wild snatches of ballads, quite insane. He tries to induce her to flee with him, but in vain. At daybreak Faust is taken away, and Gretchen, who dies, joins the heavenly choir of penitents.

Gretchen is a perfect union of homeliness and simplicity, though her love is strong as death, yet is she a human woman throughout, and never a mere abstraction. No character ever drawn takes so strong a hold on the heart, and, with all her faults, who does not love and pity her?

Greth'el (Gammer), the hypothetical narrator of the tales edited by the brothers Grimm.

* * Said to be Frau Viehmann, wife of a peasant in the suburbs of Hesse Cassel, from whose mouth the brothers transcribed the tales.

Grey (Lady Jane), a tragedy, by N. Rowe (1715). Another by Ross Neil, and one by Tennyson (1876).

In French, Laplace (1745), Mde de Staël (1800), Ch. Brifaut (1812), and Alexandre Soumet (1844), produced tragedies on the same subject. Paul Delaroche has a fine picture called "Le Supplée de Jane Grey" (1835).

Gribouille, the wisecrack who threw himself into a river that his clothes might not get wetted by the rain—A French Proverbial Saying.

Gride (Arthur), a mean old usurer, who wished to marry Madeline Bray, but Madeline loved Nicholas Nickleby, and married him. Gride was murdered—C. Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Grioux (Le chevalier de), the hero of a French novel by A. F. Prevost, called Manon l'Escout, translated into English by Charlotte Smith. A discreditable connection exists between De Grioux and Manon, but as the novel proceeds Manon changes from "the fair mischief" to the faithful companion, following the fortunes of her husband in disgrace and banishment, and dying by his side in the wilds of America (1697-1763).

Grieve (Jochie), landlord of an ale-house near Charlie's Hope—Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II).

Griffin (Allan), landlord of the Griffin inn, at Perth—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV).

Griffin-feet, the mark by which the Desert Fairy was known in all her metamorphoses — Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("The Yellow Dwarf," 1682)

Griffiths (O'd), steward of the earl of Derby — Sir W. Scott, Perceval of the Peal (time, Charles II)

Griffiths (Samuel), London agent of Sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet — Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Griflet (Sir), knighted by King Arthur at the request of Merlin, who told the king that Sir Griflet would prove "one of the best knights of the world, and the strongest man of arms" — Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 20 (1470)

Grldrig, a mannikin

See page 68, name Grildrig, which the Lady took on and afterwards the whole kingdom. The word imports what the Latin calls mannikin, the Italian homunculus, and the English an elfin — Jean Paul, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Brobdingnag," 1726)

Grim, a fisherman who rescued, from a boat turned adrift, an infant named Habloe, whom he adopted and brought up. This infant was the son of the king of Denmark, and when restored to his royal father, the fisherman, laden with rich presents, built the village, which he called after his own name, Grimsby or "Grim's town"

* The ancient seal of the town contained the names of "Gryre" and "Habloe"

Grin (Gard), a huge giant, who tried to stop pilgrims on their way to the Celestial City. He was slain by Mr Greethcart. — Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, ii (1684)

Grimalkin, a cat, the spirit of a witch. Any witch was permitted to assume the body of a cat nine times. When the "first Witch" (in Macbeth) hears a cat mew, she says, "I come, Grimalkin" (act i sc 1)

Grime, the partner of Item the usurer. It is to Grime that Item appeals when he wants to fudge his clients. "Can we do so, Mr Grime?" brings the stock answer, "Quite impossible, Mr Item" — Holcroft, The Deserter Daughter (1781), altered into The Steward Grimes (Peter), the drunken, thievish son of a steady fisherman. He had a boy, whom he killed by ill-usage, and to others he made away with, but escaped conviction through defect of evidence. As no one would live with him, he turned mad, was lodged in the parish poor-house, confessed his crimes in delirium, and died — Crabbe, Borough, xxi (1810)

Grimesby (Gaffer), an old farmer at Marlborough — Sir W. Scott, Kennilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Grimwig, an irascible old gentleman, who had a very kind heart under a rough exterior. He was Mr Brownlow's great friend, and was always declaring himself ready to "eat his head" if he was mistaken on any point on which he passed an opinion — C. Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Grinderson (Jr. Gabriel), partner of Mr Greenhorn. They are the attorneys who press Sir Arthur Wardour for the payment of debts — Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III)

Grip, the clever raven of Barnaby Rudge. During the Gordon riots it learnt the cry of "No Popery!" Other of its phrases were "I'm a devil!" "Never say die!" "Polly, put the kettle on!" etc — C. Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841)

Gripe (1 syl), a scrivener, husband of Charissa, but with a tendre for Araminta the wife of his friend Moneytrap. He is a miserly, money-loving, pig-headed hunk, but is duped out of £250 by his foolish liking for his neighbour's wife — Sir John Vanbrugh, The Confederacy (1695)

Gryp (1 syl), the English name of Geronimo, in Otway's version of Molière's comedy of Les Fourberies de Scapin. His daughter, called in French Hyacinthe, is called "Gryn," and his son Leandre is Anglicized into "Leander" — Th. Otway, The Cheats of Scapin

Gripe (Sir Francis), a man of 61, guardian of Miranda an heiress, and father of Charles. He wants to marry his ward for the sake of her money, and as she cannot obtain her property without his consent to her marriage, she pretends to be in love with him, and even fixes the day of espousals. "Gardy," quite secure that he is the man of her choice, gives his consent to her marriage, and she marries Sir George Airy, a man of 21. The old man laughs at Sir George, whom he fancies he is duping, but he is himself the dupe all through —Mrs Centlivre, The Busy Body (1709)

December 7 1700 Munden made his bow to the Covent Garden audience as "sir Francis Gripus" —Memoirs of J. S. Munden (1831)

Gripus, a stupid, venial judge, uncle of Alcmena, and the betrothed of Phædra (Alcmena's waiting-maid), in Dryden's comedy of Amphitryon. Neither Gripus nor Phædra is among the dramatis personæ of Molière's comedy of Amphitryon.

Grisilda or Griselda, the model of patience and submission, meant to allegorize the submission of a holy mind to the will of God. Grisilda was the daughter of a charcoal-burner, but became the wife of Walter marquis of Saluzo. Her husband tried her, as God tried Job, and with the same result. (1) He took away her infant daughter, and secretly conveyed it to the queen of Præia to be brought up, while the mother was made to believe that it was murdered. (2) Four years later she had a son, which was also taken from her, and was sent to be brought up with his sister. (3) Eight years later, Grisilda was divorced, and sent back to her native cottage, because her husband, as she was told, intended to marry another. When, however, lord Walter saw no indication of murmuring or jealousy, he told Grisilda that the supposed rival was her own daughter, and her patience and submission met with their full reward. —Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Clerk's Tale," 1388).

 The tale of Grisilda is the last in Boccaccio's Decameron. Petrarch rendered it into a Latin romance, entitled De Obedentia et Fide Uxoræ Mythologia. In the middle of the sixteenth century, appeared a ballad and also a prose version of Patient Grissel. Miss Edgeworth has a domestic novel entitled The Modern Griselda. The tale of Griselda is an allegory on the text, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord."

Dryden says: The tale of Grizel was the invention of Petrarca and was sent by him to Boccaccio, from whom it came to Chaucer. —Preface to Fables.

Griskinis'sa, wife of Artaxamious king of Utopia. The king felt in doubt, and asked his minister of state this knotty question:

Shall I my Griskinis'sa charms forego
Compel her to give up the royal chair,
And place the rosy Delectation there?

The minister reminds the king that Distastula is betrothed to his general.

Grissel or Grizel Octavia, the wife of Mark Antony, and sister of Augustus, is called the "patient Grizel of Roman story."

For patience she will prove a second Grissel. Shakespeare Taming of the Shrew act II. sc. 1 (1624).

Griz'el Dal'mahoy (Miss), the seamstress —Sir W. Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.)

Griz'zie, maid-servant to Mrs Saddle-tree —Sir W. Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.)

Griz'zie, one of the servants of the Rev Josiah Cargill —Sir W. Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III.)

Griz'zle, chambermaid at the Golden Arms inn, at Kippeltringan —Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II.)

Grizzle (Lord), the first peer of the realm in the court of king Arthur. He is in love with the princess Huncamunee, and as the lady is promised in marriage to the valiant Tom Thumb, he turns traitor, and "leads his rebel rout to the palace gate." Here Tom Thumb encounters the rebels, and Glumdalca, the giantess, thrusts at the traitor, but misses him. Then the "pugny giant-killer" runs him through the body. The black cart comes up to drag him off, but the dead man tells the cart he need not trouble himself, as he intends "to bear himself off," and so he does —Tom Thumb, by Fielding the novelist (1730), altered by Kane O'Hara, author of Midas (1778).

Groat'settar (Miss Clara), niece of the old lady Glowrowrum, and one of the guests at Burgh Westra.

Miss Maddie Groat'settar, niece of the old lady Glowrowrum, and one of the guests at Burgh Westra —Sir W. Scott, The Pirate (time, William III.)

(1540-1609), critics and humanists)

Groom (Square), "a downright, English, Newmarket, stable-bred gentleman-joelcy, who, having ruined his furnaces by dogs, grooms, cocks, and horses thinks to retrieve his affairs by a matrimonial alliance with a City fortune" (canto: 1) He is one of the sutors of Charlotte Goodchild, but, supposing the report to be true that she has lost her money, he says to her guardian

Ha! yet a'r Theodore; I always make my match according to the wit at my thing can carry. When I offered to take her into my stable she was sound and in good case, but I hear her wind is touched. If so I would no lock be for a illing. Matrimony is a long course and it won't do.—C. Macklin Lore & La mode, II. 1 (1778).

This was Lee Lewis's great part (1740-1803). One morning at rehearsal Lewis said something in the play. "Hey boy!" cried Macklin. "What's that?"
"What's that?" "Oh," replied Lewis, "it's only a bit of my nonsense." "Put," said Macklin, "travely. I like my nonsense Mr. Lewis, better than yours."—J. O. Heale.

Grosvenor (Grosvenor) Square,
London. So called because it is built on the property of sir Richard Grosvenor, who died 1732.

Grotto of Ephesus. Near Ephesus was a grotto containing a statue of Diana attached to a reed presented by Pan. If a young woman, charged with dishonour, entered this grotto, and the reed gave forth musical sounds she was declared to be a pure virgin, but if it gave forth hateful noises, she was denounced and never seen more. Corinna put the grotto to the test, at the desire of Glauccon of Lesbos, and was never seen again by the eye of man.—I. Bulwer-Lytton, Tales

the Oaks.

Groves (Jem), landlord of the Valiant Soldier, to which was attached "a good dry shittle-ground"—C. Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop, 1814 (1840).

Grub (Jonathan), a stock-broker, weighted with the three plagues of life—
a wife, a handsome marriageable daughter, and £100,000 in the funds, "any one of which is enough to drive a man mad, but all three to be attended to at once is too much."

Mrs Grub, a wealthy City woman, who has moved from the east to the fashionable west quarter of London, and has abandoned merchants and tradespeople for the gentry.

Emily Grub, called Milly, the handsome daughter of Jonathan. She marries captain Bevil of the Guards.—O'Brien, Cross Purposes.

Grub Street, near Moorfields, London, once famous for literary hacks and inferior literary publications. It is now called Milton Street. No compliment to our great epic poet.

* * The connection between Grub Street literature and Milton is not apparent. However, as Pindar, Hesiod, Plutarch, etc., were Bæotians, so have the martyrologist, and Speed the historian, resided in Grub Street.

Grudar and Bras'solis. Carbar and Grudar both strove for a spotted bull "that lowed on Golbun Heath," in Ulster. Lach claimed it as his own, and at length fought, when Grudar fell.
Carbar took the shield of Grudar to Brassolis, and said to her, "Fix it on high within my hall, 'tis the armour of my foe," but the maiden, "distracted, flew to the spot, where she found the youth in his blood," and died.

Fair was her collar on the plain. Stately was Grudar on the hill.—Ossian Angal I.

Gruby (John), servant to lord George Gordon. An honest fellow, who remained faithful to his master to the bitter end. He twice saved Haridule's life, and, although living under lord Gordon and loving him, defested the crimes into which his master was bo-trayed by bad advice and false zeal — C Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841)

Grugeon, one of Fortunio's seven attendants His gift was that he could eat any amount of food without satiety When Fortunio first saw him, he was eating 60,000 loaves for his breakfast — Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682)

Grum'ball (The Rev Dr), from Oxford, a papist conspirator with Redgauntlet — Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Grumbo, a giant in the tale of Tom Thumb A raven having picked up Tom Thumb, dropped him on the flat roof of the giant's castle When old Grumbo went there to sniff the air, Tom crept up his sleeve, the giant, feeling tickled, shook his sleeve, and Tom fell into the sea below Here he was swallowed by a fish, and the fish, being caught, was sold for king Arthur's table It was thus that Tom got introduced to the great king, by whom he was knighted

Grumio, one of the servants of Petruccio — Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew (1594)

Grundy (Mrs) Dame Ashfield, a farmer's wife, is jealous of a neighbouring farmer named Grundy She tells her husband that Farmer Grundy got five shillings a quarter more for his wheat than they did, that the sun seemed to shine on purpose for Farmer Grundy, that Dame Grundy's butter was the crack butter of the market She then goes into her day-dreams, and says, "If our Nelly were to marry a great baronet, I wonder what Mrs Grundy would say?" Her husband makes answer

Why don't thee letten Mrs Grundy alone? I do verily think when thee goest to totther world the wurst question thee'll ax ill be If Mrs Grundy's there? — Th. Morton Speed the Plough L 1 (1793)

Gryll, one of those changed by Acrasia into a hog He abused sir Guyon for disencanting him, whereupon the palmer said to the knight, "Let Gryll be Gryll, and have his hoggysh mind" — Spenser, Faery Queen, II 12 (1590)

Gryphon, a fabulous monster, having the upper part like a vulture or eagle, and the lower part like a lion Gryphons were the supposed guardians of gold-mines, and were in perpetual strife with the Arimas'pians, a people of Seythia, who rifled the mines for the adornment of their hair

As when a gryphon thro' the wilderness,
With winged course o'er hill or moory dale
Pursues the Arimasplan who by stealth
Had from his wakeful custody purloined
The guarded gold.

Milton, Paradise Lost II 943 etc. (1665)

The Gryphon, symbolic of the divine and human union of Jesus Christ The fore part of the gryphon is an eagle, and the hinder part a lion Thus Dante saw in purgatory the car of the Church drawn by a gryphon — Dante, Purgatory, XXXI (1308)

Guadia'na, the 'squire of Durandarte, changed into a river of the same name He was so grieved at leaving his master that he plunged instantaneously under ground, and when obliged to appear "where he might be seen, he glided in sullen state to Portugal" — Cervantes, Don Quixote, II II 6 (1615)

Gualber'to (St), heir of Valdespe'sa, and brought up with the feudal notion that he was to be the avenger of blood Anselmo was the murderer he was to lie in wait for, and he was to make it the duty of his life to have blood for blood One day, as he was lying in ambush for Anselmo, the vesper bell rang, and Gualberto (8 syl) fell in prayer, but somehow could not pray The thought struck him that if Christ died to forgive sin, it could not be right in man to hold it beyond forgiveness At this moment Anselmo came up, was attacked, and cried for mercy Gualberto cast away his dagger, ran to the neighbouring convent, thanked God he had been saved from blood-guiltiness, and became a hermit noted for his holiness of life — Southey, St Gualberto

Guards of the Pole, the two stars β and γ of the Great Bear, and not the star Arctoph'lax, which, Stevens says, "literally signifies the guard of the Bear," i.e. Bootes (not the Polar Guards) Shakespeare refers to these two "guards" in Othello, act II sc 1, where he says the surge seems to "quench the guards of the ever-fixed pole" Hood says they are so called "from the Spanish word guardar, which is 'to behold,' because they are diligently to be looked upon in regard of the singular use which they have in navigation" — Use of the Celestial Globe (1590)

How to knowe the hours of the night by the [Polar] Guards by knowing on what point of the compass they shall be at midnight every fifteenth day throughout the whole year — Norman, Safeguard of Sailors (1637)

Gua'rini (Philip), the 'squire of sir Hugo de Laey.—Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Guarinos (Admiral), one of Charlemagne's paladins, taken captive at Roncesvallés. He fell to the lot of Marlotés, a Moslem, who offered him his daughter in marriage if he would become a disciple of the Arabian prophet. Guarinos refused, and was kept in a dungeon for seven years, when he was liberated, that he might take part in a joust. The admiral then stabbed the Moor to his heart, and, vaulting on his grey horse Treh'ozond, escaped to France.

Gu'drun, a lady married to Sigurd by the magical arts of her mother, and on the death of Sigurd to Atli (Attila), whom she hated for his fierce cruelty, and murdered. She then cast herself into the sea, and the waves bore her to the castle of king Jonahan, who became her third husband.—Edda of Sámund Sigfusson (1130)

Gu'drun, a model of heroic fortitude and pious resignation. She was the daughter of king Hettel (Attila), and the betrothed of Herwig king of Heligoland, but was carried off by Harmuth king of Norway, who killed Hettel. As she refused to marry Harmuth, he put her to all sorts of menial work. One day, Herwig appeared with an army, and having gained a decisive victory, married Gudrun, and at her intercession pardoned Harmuth the cause of her great misery.—A North-Saxon Poem (thirteenth century)

Gud'yill (Old John), butler to lady Bellenden.—Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

Guelph'o (3 syl), son of Actins IV marquis d'Este and of Cunigunda (a German). Guelpho was the uncle of Rinaldo, and next in command to Godfrey. He led an army of 5000 men from Carynthia, in Germany, to the siege of Jerusalem, but most of them were cut off by the Persians. Guelpho was noted for his broad shoulders and ample chest.—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, iii (1575)

Guen'dolen (3 syl), a fairy whose mother was a human being. King Arthur fell in love with her, and she became the mother of Gyneth. When Arthur deserted the frail fair one, she offered him a parting cup, but as he took it in his hand, a drop of the liquor fell on his horse and burnt it so severely that it "leapt twenty feet high," ran mad, and died. Arthur dashed the cup on the ground, whereupon it set fire to the grass and consumed the fairy palace. As for Guendolen, she was never seen afterwards.—Sir W Scott, The Bridal of Triermain, i 2 ("Lyolph's Tale," 1813)

Guendolœ'na, wife of Locrin (eldest son of Brute, whom he succeeded), and daughter of Corineus (3 syl). Being divorced, she retired to Cornwall, and collected an army, which marched against Locrin, who "was killed by the shot of an arrow." Guendolœna now assumed the reins of government, and her first act was to throw Estrildis (her rival) and her daughter Sabre into the Severn, which was called Sabri'na or Sabren from that day.—Geoffrey, British History, ii 4, 5 (1142)

Guenever or Guinever, a corrupt form of Guanhuma'ra (4 syl), daughter of king Leodegrance of the land of Cameliard. She was the most beautiful of women, was the wife of king Arthur, but entertained a criminal attachment to sir Lancelot du Lac. Respecting the latter part of the queen's history, the greatest diversity occurs. Thus, Geoffrey says

King Arthur was on his way to Rome when news was brought him that his nephew Mordred to whom he had entrusted Britain had set the crown upon his own head and that the queen Guanhumara had wickedly married him. When king Arthur returned and put Mordred and his army to flight the queen fled from York to the City of Legions (Leicester in South Wales), where she resolved to lead a chaste life among the nuns of Julius the martyr.—British History xi. 1 (1142)

Another version is, that Arthur, being informed of the adulterous conduct of Lancelot, went with an army to Benwick (Brittany), to punish him. That Mordred (his son by his own sister), left as regent, usurped the crown, proclaimed that Arthur was dead, and tried to marry Guenever the queen, but she shut herself up in the Tower of London, resolved to die rather than marry the usurper. When she heard of the death of Arthur, she "stole away" to Almesbury, "and there she let make herself a nun, and wore white cloaths and black." And there lived she "in fasting, prayers, and alms-deeds, that all marvelled at her virtuous life."—Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, iii 161-170 (1470)

* * For Tennyson's account, see GUINEVER

Guene'vra (3 syl), wife of Nec-tavernus the dwarf, at the cell of the hermit of Engaddi:—Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I.)

Guer'in or Gueri'no, son of Millon king of Albania. On the day of his birth his father was dethroned, but the child was rescued by a Greek slave, who brought it up and surnamed it Meschi'no or "The Wretched." When grown to man's estate, Guer'in fell in love with the princess Elizabeth, sister of the Greek emperor, who held his court at Constantinople.—An Italian Romance

Guesclin's Dust a Talisman. Guesclin, or rather Du Guesclin, constable of France, laid siege to Châteauneuf-de-Randan, in Auvergne. After several assaults, the town promised to surrender if not relieved within fifteen days. Du Guesclin died in this interval, but the governor of the town came and laid the keys of the city on the dead man's body, saying he resigned the place to the hero's ashes (1380).

France demands his bones [Napoleons],
To carry onward in the battle van
To form like Guesclin's dust, her talisman
Byron, Age of Bronze iv (1821)

Gugner, Odin's spear, which never failed to hit. It was made by the dwarf Fitri.—The Eddas

Gudernus, elder son of Cymbeline (3 syl.) king of Britain, and brother of Arviragus. They were kidnapped in infancy by Belarius, out of revenge for being unjustly banished, and were brought up by him in a cave. When grown to manhood, Belarius introduced them to the king, and told their story, whereupon Cymbeline received them as his sons, and Gudernus succeeded him on the throne.—Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605)

Geoffrey calls Cymbeline "Kymbelinus son of Tenuantius," says that he was brought up by Augustus Cæsar, and adds: "In his days was born our Lord Jesus Christ." Kymbeline reigned ten years, when he was succeeded by Gudernus. The historian says that Kymbeline paid the tribute to the Romans, and that it was Gudernus who refused to do so, "for which reason Claudius the emperor marched against him, and he was killed by Ilmo."—British History, iv 11, 12, 13 (1142)

Guido "the Savage," son of Amon and Constantia. He was the younger brother of Rinaldo. Being wrecked on the coast of the Amazons, he was compelled to fight their ten male champions, and, having slain them all, to marry ten of the Amazons. From this thralldom Guido made his escape, and joined the army of Charlemagne.—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Guido [FRANCESCINI], a reduced nobleman, who tried to repair his fortune by marrying Pompilia, the putative child of Pietro and Violante. When the marriage was consummated, and the money secure, Guido ill-treated the putative parents, and Violante, in revenge, declared that Pompilia was not their child at all, but the offspring of a Roman wanton. Having made this declaration, she next applied to the law-courts for the recovery of the money. When Guido heard this tale, he was furious, and so ill-treated his child-wife that she ran away, under the protection of a young canon. Guido pursued the fugitives, overtook them, and had them arrested, whereupon the canon was suspended for three years, and Pompilia sent to a convent. Here her health gave way, and as the birth of a child was expected, she was permitted to leave the convent and live with her putative parents. Guido, having gained admission, murdered all three, and was himself executed for the crime.—R. Browning, The Ring and the Book

Guil'denstern, one of Hamlet's companions, employed by the king and queen to divert him, if possible, from his strange and wayward ways.—Shakespeare, Hamlet (1596)

Poenerantz and Guil'denstern are favourable samples of the thorough-paced time-serving court knave tickled and to be hired for any hard or dirty work.—Cowden Clarke.

Guillotièrre (4 syl.), the seum of Lyons. La Guillotièrre is the low quarter, where the bouches mutiles find refuge.

Guillotine (3 syl.) So named from Joseph Ignace Guillotin, a French physician, who proposed its adoption, to prevent unnecessary pain. Dr. Guillotin did not invent the guillotine, but he improved the Italian machine (1791). In 1792 Antoine Louis introduced further improvements, and hence the instrument is sometimes called Lousette or Louison. The original Italian machine was called mannaja, it was a clumsy affair, first employed to decapitate Beatrice Cenci in Rome, A.D. 1600.

It was the popular theme for jests. It was called La mère Guillotine, the "sharp female," the "best cure for headache." It infallibly prevented the hair from turn-ling grey." It imparted a peculiar delicacy to the complexion." It was the national razor which shaved close. Those who kissed the gullotine looked through the little window and sneezed into the sack." It was the sign of the regeneration of the human race. It superseded the cross." Models were worn (as ornaments).—C Dickens, A Tale of Two Cities iii 4 (1859)

Gunart (Rogue), whose true name was Pedro Roeha Guinarda, chief of a band of robbers who levied black mail in the mountainous districts of Catalonia. He is introduced by Cervantes in his tale of Don Quixote.

Guinea (Adventures of a), a novel by Charles Johnstone (1761). A guinea, as it passes into different hands, is the historian of the follies and vices of its master for the time being, and thus a series of scenes and personages are made to pass before the reader, somewhat in the same manner as in The Devil upon Two Sticks and in The Chinese Tales.

Guinea-ben, a filie de joie, a word of contempt and indignity for a woman.

Ere I would drown myself for the love of a guinea-ben I would change my humanity with a baboon.
—Shakespeare Othello act I. sc. 3 (1611)

Guinea-pig (A), a gentleman of sufficient name to form a bait, who allows himself to be put on a directors' list for the guinea and lunch which the board provides.—City Slang

Guinevere (3 syl.) So Tennyson spells the name of Arthur's queen in his Idylls. He tells us of the liaison between her and "sir Lancelot," and says that Modred, having discovered this familiarity, "brought his creatures to the basement of the tower for testimony." Sir Lancelot flung the fellow to the ground, and instantly took to horse, while Guinevere fled to the nunnery at Almesbury. Here the king took leave of her, and when the abbess died, the queen was appointed her successor, and remained head of the establishment for three years, when she also died.

* * It will be seen that Tennyson departs from the British History by Geoffrey, and the History of Prince Arthur as edited by sir T. Malory (See GUENEVER)

Guomax, mother of the vain-glorious Duarte.—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Custom of the Country (1647)

Guiscardo, the squire, but previously the page, of the Tancred king of Salerno. Sigismunda, the king's daughter, loved him, and clandestinely married him. When Tancred discovered it, he ordered the young man to be waylaid and strangled. He then went to his daughter's chamber, and reproved her for loving a base-born "slave." Sigismunda boldly defended her choice, but next day received a human heart in a golden casket. It needed no prophet to tell her what had happened, and she drank a draught of poison. Her father entered just in time to hear her dying request that she and Guiscardo might be buried in the same tomb. The royal father

Too late repented of his cruel deed
One common sepulchre for both decreed
Intombed the wretched pair in royal state
And on their monument inscribed their fate
Dryden Sigismunda and Guiscardo (from Boccaccio)

Guise (Henri de Lorraine, duc de) commenced the Massacre of Bartholomew by the assassination of admiral Coligny [Co leen' ye]. Being forbidden to enter Paris, by order of Henri III, he disobeyed the injunction, and was murdered (1550-1588).

* * Henri de Guise has furnished the subject of several tragedies. In English we have Guise or the Massacre of France, by John Webster (1620), The Duke of Guise, by Dryden and Lee. In French we have Etats de Blois (the Death of Guise), by François Raynouard (1814).

Guisla (2 syl.), sister of Pelayo, in love with Numae, a renegade. "She inherited her mother's leprous taint." Brought back to her brother's house by Adosinda, she returned to the Moor, "cursing the meddling spirit that interfered with her most shameless love."—Southey, Roderick, Last of the Goths (1814).

Guizor (2 syl.), groom of the Saracen Pollenté. His "scalp was bare, betraying his state of bondage." His office was to keep the bridge on Pollenté's territory, and to allow no one to pass without paying "the passage-penny." This bridge was full of trap-doors, through which travellers were apt to fall into the river below. When Guizor demanded toll of sir Artégat, the knight gave him a "stunning blow, saying, 'Lo! there's my hire,'" and the villain dropped down dead.—Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 2 (1596).

* * Upton conjectures that "Guizor" is intended for the duc de Guise, and his master "Pollenté" for Charles IX of France, notorious both for the St Bartholomew Massacre.

Gulbey'az, the sultana. Having seen Juan amongst Lambro's captives,

"passing on his way to sale," she caused him to be purchased, and introduced into the harem in female attire. On discovering that he preferred Duda, one of the attendant beauties, to herself, she commanded both to be stitched up in a sack, and cast into the Bosphorus. They contrived, however, to make their escape — Byron, Don Juan, vi (1824)

Gul'chenraz, surnamed "Gundog-di" ("morning"), daughter of Malek-al-salem king of Georgia, to whom Lum-Hoan the mandarin relates his numerous and extraordinary transformations or rather metempsychoses — T S Guculetto, Chinese Tales (1723)

Gul'chenrouz, son of Ali Hassan (brother of the emir' Fakreddin), the "most delicate and lovely youth in the whole world." He could "write with precision, paint on vellum, sing to the lute, write poetry, and dance to perfection, but could neither hurl the lance nor curb the steed." Gulchenrouz was betrothed to his cousin Nouronihar, who loved "even his faults," but they never married, for Nouronihar became the wife of the eunuch Vathek — W Beckford, Vathek (1784)

Gulistan ("the rose garden"), a collection of tales and apophthegms in prose and verse by Saadi, a native of Shiraz. It has been translated into English by Gladwin

Even beggars, in soliciting alms, will give utterance to some appropriate passage from the Gulistan — J J Grandville

Guliver (Imuel), first a surgeon, then a sea-captain of several ships. He gets wrecked on the coast of Lilliput, a country of pygmies. Subsequently he is thrown among the people of Brobdingnag, giants of tremendous size. In his next voyage he is driven to Laputa, an empire of quack pretenders to science and knavish projectors. And in his fourth voyage he visits the Houyhnhnms [Whin' nms], where horses were the dominant powers — Dean Swift, Travels in Several Remote Nations by Lemuel Guliver (1726)

Gulna'ie (3 syl), daughter of Faras'chê (3 syl) whose husband was king of an under-sea empire. A usurper drove the king her father from his throne, and Gulna'ie sought safety in the Island of the Moon. Here she was captured, made a slave, sold to the king of Persia, and became his favourite, but preserved a most obstinate and speechless silence for twelve months. Then the king made her his wife, and she told him her history. In due time a son was born, whom they called Beder ("the full moon")

Gulnarê says that the under-sea folk are never wetted by the water, that they can see as well as we can, that they speak the language "of Solomon's seal," and can transport themselves instantaneously from place to place — Arabian Nights ("Beder and Gulnarê"),

Gulnare (2 syl), queen of the harem, and the most beautiful of all the slaves of Seyd [Sed]. She was rescued by Conrad the corsair from the flames of the palace, and, when Conrad was imprisoned, she went to his dungeon, confessed her love, and proposed that he should murder the sultan and flee. As Conrad refused to assassinate Seyd, she herself did it, and then fled with Conrad to the "Pirate's Isle." The rest of the tale is continued in Lara, in which Gulnare assumes the name of Kaled, and appears as a page — Byron, The Corsair (1814)

Gulvigar ("weigher of gold"), the Plutus of Scandinavian mythology. He introduced among men the love of gain

Gum'midge (Mrs), the widow of Dan'el Peggotty's partner. She kept house for Dan'el, who was a brechelet. Old Mrs Gum'midge had a craze that she was neglected and unrequited for, a wail in the wide world, of no use to any one. She was always talking of herself as the "lone lorn ere'tur." When about to sail for Australia, one of the sailors asked her to marry him, when "she ups with a pail of water and flings it at his head" — C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

Gundof'orius, an Indian king for whom the apostle Thomas built a palace of sethym wood, the roof of which was ebony. He made the gates of the horn of the "horned snake," that no one with poison might be able to pass through

Günther, king of Burgundy and brother of Kriemhild (2 syl). He resolved to wed Brunhild, the martial queen of Issland, and won her by the aid of Siegfried, but the bride behaved so obstrepously that the bridegroom had again to apply to his friend for assistance. Siegfried contrived to get possession of her ring and girdle, after which she became a submissive wife. Günther, with base ingratitude, was privy to the murder of his friend, and was himself slain in the dungeon of Etzel by his sister Kriemhild—The Nibelungen Lied.

  In history, Günther is called "Güntacher," and Etzel "Attila."

Guppy (Mr.), clerk in the office of Kenge and Carboy. A weak, commonplace youth, who has the conceit to propose to Esther Summerson, the ward in Chancery—C Dickens, Bleak House (1853).

Gurgustus, according to Drayton, son of Belinus. This is a mistake, as Gurgustus, or rather Gurgustius, was son of Rivallo, and the son of Belinus was Gurgunt Brabtruc. The names given by Geoffrey, in his British History, run thus: Leir (Lear), Cunedag his grandson, Rivallo his son, Gurgustius his son, Sisilius his son, Jago nephew of Gurgustius, Kinmare son of Sisilius, then Gorbogud. Here the line is broken, and the new dynasty begins with Molmutius of Cornwall, then his son Belinus, who was succeeded by his son Gurgunt Brabtruc, whose son and successor was Guthelin, called by Drayton "Gynteline"—Geoffrey, British History, ii, iii (1142).

In greatness next succeeds Bellus' worthy son
 Gurgustius, who soon left what his great father won
 To Gynteline his heir.

Gurth, the swine-herd and thrall of Cedric of Rotherwood—Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Gurton (Gammer), the heroine of an old English comedy. The plot turns upon the loss of a needle by Gammer Gurton, and its subsequent discovery sticking in the breeches of her man Hodge—Mr J. S. Master of Arts (1561).

Guse Gibbie, a half-witted lad in the service of lady Bellenden—Sir W. Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Gushington (Angelina), the nom de plume of lady Duffern.

Gustavus III. used to say there were two things he held in equal abhorrence—the German language and tobacco.

Gusta'vus Vasa (1496-1560), having made his escape from Denmark, where he had been treacherously carried captive, worked as a common labourer for a time in the copper-mines of Dalecarlia [Dal' le par' va], but the tyranny of Christian II. of Denmark induced the Dalecarlians to revolt, and Gustavus was chosen their leader. The rebels made themselves masters of Stockholm, Christian abdicated, and Sweden henceforth became an independent kingdom—H. Brooke, Gustavus Vasa (1730).

Gus'ter, the Snagsbys' maid-of-all-work. A poor, overworked drudge, subject to fits—C Dickens, Bleak House (1853).

Gusto Picaresco ("the love of roquetry"). In romances of this class the Spaniards especially excel, as don Diego de Mondoza's Lazarillo de Tormes (1553), Mateo Aleman's Guzman d'Alfarache (1599), Quevedo's Gran Tacano, etc.

Guthrie (John), one of the archers of the Scottish guard in the employ of Louis XI.—Sir W. Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Gutter Lane, London, a corruption of Guthurum Lane, so called from a Mr. Guthurum or Guthrum, who "possessed the chief property therein"—Slow, Survey of London (1598).

Gutter Lyrist (The), Robert Williams Buchanan, so called from his poems on the loves of costermongers and their wenches (1841-).

Guy (Thomas), the miser and philanthropist. He amassed an immense fortune in 1720 by speculations in South Sea stock, and gave £238,292 to found and endow Guy's Hospital (1644-1724).

Guy earl of Warwick, an English knight. He proposed marriage to Phelis or Phillis, who refused to listen to his suit till he had distinguished himself by knightly deeds. He first rescued Blanche daughter of the emperor of Germany, then fought against the Saracens, and slew the doughty Coldran, Elmage king of Tyre, and the Soldan himself. Then, returning to England, he was accepted by Phelis and married her. In forty days he returned to the Holy Land, when he redeemed earl Jonas out of prison, slew the giant Amcrant, and performed many other noble exploits. Again he returned to England, just in time to encounter the Danish giant Colebrond (2 syl) or Colbrand, which combat is minutely described by Drayton, in his Polyolbion, cii. At Windsor he slew a boar "of passing might." On Dunsmore Heath he slew the dun cow of Dunsmore, a wild and cruel monster. In Northumberland he slew a winged dragon, "black as any cole," with the paws of a lion, and a hide which no sword could pierce (Polyolbion, ciii). After this he turned hermit, and went daily to crave bread of his wife Pheliss, who knew him not. On his death-bed he sent her a ring, and she closed his dying eyes (890-958).

Guy Fawkes, the conspirator, went under the name of John Johnstone, and pretended to be the servant of Mr Percy (1577-1606).

Guy Mannering, the second of Scott's historical novels, published in 1815, just seven months after Waverley. The interest of the tale is well sustained, but the love scenes, female characters, and Guy Mannering himself are quite worthless. Not so the character of Dandy Dimmont, the shrewd and witty counsellor Pleydell, the desperate sea-beaten villain of Hatteraick, the uncouth devotion of that gentlest of all pedants poor Domine Sampson, and the savage crazed superstition of the gipsy-dweller in Dernelough (time, George II.).

Guy Mannering was the work of six weeks about Christmas-time, and marks of haste are visible both in the plot and in its development.—Chambers, English Literature ii. 686.

Guyn'teline or Guuth'elin, according to Geoffrey, son of Gurguunt Brabtruc (British History, iii. 11, 12, 13), but, according to Drayton, son of Gurgustus an early British king (See GURGUSTUS). His queen was Martia, who codified what are called the Martin Laws, translated into Anglo-Saxon by king Alfred (See MARTIN LAWS).

Gurgustus left what his great father won

Guyon (Sir), the personification of "temperance." The victory of temperance over intemperance is the subject of bk. ii. of the Faery Queen. Sir Guyon first lights on Amavia (intemperance of grief), a woman who kills herself out of grief for her husband, and he takes her infant boy and commits it to the cure of Medi'na. He next meets Braggadoccio (intemperance of the tongue), who is stripped bare of everything. He then encounters Iroro (intemperance of anger), and delivers Phron from his hands. Intemperance of desire is discomfited in the persons of Paroelcs and Cymocelcs, then intemperance of pleasure, or wantonness, in the person of Phædræ. After his victory over wantonness, he sees Mammon (intemperance of worldly wealth and honour), but he rejects all his offers, and Mammon is foiled. His last and great achievement is the destruction of the "Bower of Bliss," and the binding in chains of adamant the enchantress Acrasia (or intemperance generally). This enchantress was fearless against Force, but Wisdom and Temperance prevailed against her.—Spenser, Faery Queen, ii. 12 (1590).

Guyot (Bertrand), one of the archers in the Scottish guard attached to Louis XI.—Sir W. Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Guzman d'Alfara'che (1 syl), hero of a Spanish romance of roguery. He begins by being a dupe, but soon becomes a knave in the character of stable-boy, beggar, swindler, prander, student, merchant, and so on.—Mateo Alemán (1599).

* Probably The Life of Guzman Alfarache suggested to Lesage The Life of Gil Blas. It is certain that Lesage borrowed from it the incident of the parasite who obtained a capital supper out of the greenhorn by terming him the eighth wonder.

Gyas and Cloan'thus, two companions of Aeneas, generally mentioned together as "fortis Gyas fortisque Cloan'thus." The phrase has become proverbial for two very similar characters—Virgil, Aeneid.

Gyges (2 syl.), one of the Titans. He had fifty heads and a hundred hands.

Gyges, a king of Lydia, of whom Apollo said he deemed the poor Arcadian Ag'laoos more happy than the king Gyges, who was proverbial for his wealth.

Gyges (2 syl.), who dethroned Candaules (3 syl.) king of Lydia, and married Nyssia the young widow. Herodotos says that Candaules showed Gyges the queen in her bath, and the queen, indignant at this impropriety, induced Gyges to kill the king and marry her (bk 1 8). He reigned B.C. 716–678.

Gyges's Ring rendered the wearer invisible. Plato says that Gyges found the ring in the flanks of a brazen horse, and was enabled by this talisman to enter the king's chamber unseen, and murder him.

Gynec'ium, the apartment in which the Anglo-Saxon women lived.—Fosbroke, Antiquities, ii 570 (1824).

Gyneth, natural daughter of Gwendolen and king Arthur. The king promised to give her in marriage to the bravest knight in a tournament in which the warder was given to her to drop when she pleased. The haughty beauty saw twenty knights fall, among whom was Vanoc, son of Merlin. Immediately Vanoc fell, Merlin rose, put an end to the jousts, and caused Gyneth to fall into a trance, from which she was never to wake till her hand was claimed in marriage by some knight as brave as those who had fallen in the tournament. After the lapse of 500 years, De Vaux undertook to break the spell, and had to overcome four temptations, viz, fear, avarice, pleasure, and ambition. Having succeeded in these encounters, Gyneth awoke and became his bride.—Sir W. Scott, Bridal of Triermain (1813).

Gyp, the college servant of Blushington, who stole his tea and sugar, candles, and so on. After Blushington came into his fortune, he made Gyp his chief domestic and private secretary.—W. T. Moncreiff, The Bashful Man.

Gyptian (Sant), a vagrant.

Percy's [prophane] sonnet, lines 5.—Gyptian's plying image
D'd call me a month (yea, some times more)
To take the bowres [to reject the food provided].
Exchange they had no be ter chere in store
G. Gascoigne. The Frutes of Warre, 100 (died 1557).

H

H. B., the initials adopted by Mr. Doyle, father of Richard Doyle, in his Perform Caricatures (1830).

H. U. (hard up), an H. U. member of society.

Hackburn (Simon of), a friend of Hobbie Elliott, farmer at the Heugh-foot.—Sir W. Scott, The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Hackum (Captain), a thick-headed bully of Alsatia, once a sergeant in Flanders. He deserted his colours, fled to England, took refuge in Alsatia, and assumed the title of captain.—Shadwell, Squire of Alsatia (1688).

Had I a Heart for Falsehood Framed!—Sheridan, The Duenna (1778).

Hadad, one of the six Wise Men of the East led by the guiding star to Jesus. He left his beloved consort, fairest of the daughters of Beth'nim. At his decease she shed no tear, yet was her love exceeding that of mortals.—Klopstock, The Messiah, v (1771).

Had'away (Jack), a former neighbour of Nanty Lwart the smuggler-captain.—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Ha'des (2 syl.), the god of the unseen world, also applied to the grave, or the abode of departed spirits.

* * In the Apostles' Creed, the phrase

"descended into hell" is equivalent to "descended into hades"

Hadgi (Abdallah el), the soldan's envoy—Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I)

Hadoway (Mrs), Fovel's landlady at Fairport—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III)

Hadramaut, a province containing the pit where the souls of infidels dwell after death. The word means "Chambers of death"—Al Korân

Hæ'mony, a most potent countercharm, more powerful even than mô'ly (q v). So called from Hæmonia, i.e. Thessaly, the land of magics a small unsightly root,

But of divine effect
The leaf was darkish and had prickles on it

Treads on it daily with his clouted shoon not in this cold
the dull swain

And bade me keep it, as of sorcer'n use it me
Gainst all enchantments, midfear, blast, or damp
Or ghastly furies apparition.

Milton Comus (1634)

Hæmos, in Latin Hæmus, a chain of mountains forming the northern boundary of Thrace. Very celebrated by poets as "the cool Hæmus"

And Hæmus hills with snows eternal crown'd
—Pope Iliad II 49 (1715)

Hafed, a gheber or fire-worshipper, in love with Hinda the emirs' daughter. He was the leader of a band sworn to free their country or die in the attempt. His rendezvous was betrayed, but when the Moslem came to arrest him, he threw himself into the sacred fire and was burnt to death—T. Moore, Lalla Rookh ("The Fire-Worshippers," 1817)

Haf'edal, the protector of travellers, one of the four gods of the Adites (2 syl)

Hafiz, the nom de plume of Mr Stott in the Morning Press. Byron calls him, "grovelling Stott," and adds, "What would be the sentiment of the Persian Anacreon if he could behold his name assumed by one Stott of Dromore, the most impudent and execrable of literary poachers?"—English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809)

Hafod. As big a fool as Jack Hafod. Jack Hafod was a retainer of Mr Bartlett of Castlemorton, Worcestershire, and the ultimus scurrarum of Great Britain. He died at the close of the eighteenth century.

Hagan, son of a mortal and a sea-goblin, the Achilles of German romance. He stabbed Siegfried while drinking from a brook, and laid the body at the door of Kriemhild, that she might suppose he had been killed by assassins. Hagan, having killed Siegfried, then seized the "Nibelung hoard," and buried it in the Rhine, intending to appropriate it. Kriemhild, after her marriage with Etzel king of the Huns, invited him to the court of her husband, and cut off his head. He is described as "well grown, strongly built, with long sinewy legs, deep broad chest, hair slightly grey, of terrible visage, and of lordly gait" (stanza 1789)—The Nibelungen Lied (1210).

Ha'garenes (3 syl), the descendants of Hagar. The Arabs and the Spanish Moors are so called.

Often he [St James] hath been seen conquering and destroying the Hagarenes.—Cervantes, Don Quixote II. iv c (1615)

Hagenbach (Sir Archibald von), governor of La Perette—Sir W. Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Hague (1 syl). This word means "meadow," and is called in the Dutch, S' Gravenhagen ("the count's hague or meadow")

Haïatal'nefous (5 syl), daughter and only child of Ar'manos king of the "Isle of Ebony." She and Badoura were the two wives of prince Camatal'zaman, and gave birth at the same time to two princes. Badoura called her son Amgiad ("the most glorious"), and Haïatal'nefous called her's Assad ("the most happy")—Arabian Nights ("Camatalzaman and Badoura")

Haidee, "the beauty of the Cyclades," was the daughter of Lambro a Greek pirate, living in one of the Cyclades. Her mother was a Moorish maiden of Fez, who died when Haidee was a mere child. Being brought up in utter loneliness, she was wholly Nature's child. One day, don Juan was cast on the shore, the only one saved from a shipwrecked crew, tossed about for many days in the long-boat. Haidee lighted on the lad, and, having nursed him in a cave, fell in love with him. A report being heard that Lambro was dead, don Juan gave a banquet, but in the midst of recovered from his fever—Sir W Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I)

Halcro (Claud), the old bard of Magnus Troul the udaller of Zetland—Sir W Scott, The Pirate (time, William III.)

* * A udaller is one who holds his land by allodial tenure

Halcyon a Weathercock. It is said that if the kingfisher or halcyon is hung, it will show which way the wind blows by veering about.

How now stands the wind?
Into what corner peers my halcyon's bill?
Marlowe Jew of Malta (1596).

Or as a halcyon with her turning breast,
Demonstrates wind from wind and east from west.
Stover Life and Death of Thom. Nolley Card. (1599)

Halden or Halldene (2 syl), a Danish king, who with Basrig or Bagscæg, another Scandinavian king, made (in 871) a descent upon Wessex, and in that one year nine pitched battles were fought with the islanders. The first was Englefield, in Berkshire, in which the Danes were beaten, the second was Reading, in which the Danes were victorious, the third was the famous battle of Æscsedun or Ashdune, in which the Danes were defeated with great loss, and king Bagscæg was slain. In 909, Halldene was slain in the battle of Wodnesfield (Staffordshire)

Feading ye regained
Where Basrig ye outbraved and Halden sword to sword.
Dryden, Polyolbion, xii. (1613)

Hal'dimund (Sir Ewes), a friend of lord Dalgarno—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Hales (John), called "The Ever-Memorable" (1584–1656)

The works of John Hales were published after his death, in 1659, under the title of The Golden Remains of the Ever-Memorable Mr John Hales of Eton College (three vols)

Halkit (Mr), a young lawyer in the introduction of Sir W Scott's Heart of Midlothian (1818)

Hall (Sir Christopher), an officer in the army of Montrose—Sir W Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I)

Hallam's Greek. Henry Hallam reviewed, in The Edinburgh, Payne Knight's book entitled An Analytical Inquiry into the Principles of Taste, and lashed most unmercifully some Greek verses therein. It was not discovered that the lines were PINDAR's till it was too late to cancel the critique—Crabb Robinson, Diary, i. 277

Classic Hallam, much renowned for Greek
Byron, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809)

Haller (Mrs). At the age of 16 Adelaide [Mrs Haller] married the count Waldbourg, from whom she eloped. The count then led a roving life, and was known as "the stranger." The countess, repenting of her folly, assumed (for three years) the name of Mrs Haller, and took service under the countess of Wintensen, whose affection she won by her amiability and sweetness of temper. Baron Steinfors fell in love with her, but, hearing her tale, interested himself in bringing about a reconciliation between Mrs Haller and "the stranger," who happened, at the time, to be living in the same neighbourhood. They met and bade adieu, but when their children were brought forth they relented, and rushed into each other's arms—Benj Thompson, The Stranger (1797). Adapted from Kotzebue

In Mrs Haller "the powers of Miss O'Neill, aided by her beauty shone forth in the highest perfection and when she appeared in that character with John Kemble as The Stranger "a spectacle was exhibited such as no one ever saw before, or will ever see again.—Sir A. Allison.

Hallday (Tom), a private in the royal army—Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

Hamartia, a Sin personified, offspring of the red dragon and Eve. "A foul, deformed" monster, "more foul, deformed, the sun yet never saw." "A woman seemed she in the upper part," but "the rest was in serpent form," though out of sight. Fully described in canto xii of The Purple Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher (Greek, hamartia, "sin")

Hamet, son of Mandanê and Zamti (a Chinese mandarin). When the infant prince Zaphumri, called "the orphan of China," was committed to the care of Zamti, Hamet was sent to Corea, and placed under the charge of Morit, but when grown to manhood, he led a band of insurgents against Ti'mn'kan' the Tartar, who had usurped the throne of China. He was seized and condemned to death, under the conviction that he was Zaphumri the prince Etan (who was the real Zaphumri) now came forward to acknowledge his rank, and Timurhan, unable to ascertain which was the true prince, ordered them both to execution. At this juncture a party of insurgents arrived, Hamet and Zaphumri were set at liberty, Timurhan was slain, and Zaphumri was raised to the throne of his forefathers

—Murphy, The Orphan of China

Hamlet, one of the black slaves of sir Brian de Bois Guilbert preceptor of the Knights Templars.—Sir W Scott, Canoe (time, Richard I)

Hamlet (The Cid) or THE CID HAMLET BENEFICENT, the hypothetical Moorish chronicler who is fabled by Cervantes to have written the adventures of "don Quixote"

O Nature's noblest gift my gray goose quill!
Our task complete like Hamet's, shall be free.
Eyton English Guards and So on I believe (1839)
The shrewd Cid Hamet addressing himself to his pen says, And now my slender quill, whether skillfully cut or otherwise here from this rascal, surrounded by a wire, shalt thou peacefully live to distant times, unless the hand of some rash historian disturb thy repose by taking thee down and praising thee.—Cervantes, Don Quixote (last chap., 1610).

Hamilton (Lady Emily), sister of lord Evandale.—Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

Hamiltrude (3 syl), a poor Frenchwoman, the first of Charlemagne's nine wives. She bore him several children

Her neck was tinged with a delicate rose. Her locks were bound about her temples with gold and purple buds. Her dress was looped up with ruby clasp. Her coronet and her purple robes gave her an air of surpassing majesty.—L Epine Croquetaine III

Hamlet, prince of Denmark, a man of mind but not of action, nephew of Claudius the reigning king, who had married the widowed queen. Hamlet loved Ophelia, daughter of Polonius the lord chamberlain, but feeling it to be his duty to revenge his father's murder, he abandoned the idea of marriage, and treated Ophelia so strangely, that she went mad, and, gathering flowers from a brook, fell into the water and was drowned. While wasting his energy in speculation, Hamlet accepted a challenge from Laertes of a friendly contest with foils, but Laertes used a poisoned rapier, with which he stabbed the young prince. A scuffle ensued, in which the combatants changed weapons, and Laertes being stabbed, both died.—Shakespeare, Hamlet (1596).

"The whole play," says Schlegel, "is intended to show that calculating consideration which exhausts the power of action." Goethe is of the same opinion, and says that "Hamlet is a noble nature, without the strength of nerve which forms a hero. He sinks beneath a burden which he cannot bear, and cannot [make up his mind to] cast aside."

 The best actors of "Hamlet" have been Thomas Betterton (1635-1710), Robert Wilks (1670-1732), Garrick (1716-1779), John Henderson (1717-1785), J P Kemble (1757-1823), and W H Betty (1792-1874). Next to these C. Kemble (1775-1854), C M Young (1777-1856), Edmund Kean (1787-1833), Henry Irving (1810-), etc.

 In the History of Hamlet, Hamlet's father is called "Horvendille."

Hammer (The), Judas Asamonæus, surnamed Maccabæus, "the hammer" (B.C. 166-136).

Charles Martel (689-741)

On prétend qu'on lui donna le surnom de Martel parcequ'il avoit combattu comme avec un marteau les barbares qui sous la conduite d'Abderrame, avoient envahi la France.—Louillet.

Hammer and Scourge of England, sir William Wallace (1270-1305)

Hammer of Heretics

1 PHILIP D'AMIN, president of the council which condemned John Huss (1350-1425)

2 ST AUGUSTINE, "the pillar of truth and hammer of heresies" (395-130)—Hakewell

3 JOHN FALLOP So called from the title of one of his works, Malleus Medicorum (1170-1511)

Hammer of Scotland, Edward I. His son inscribed on his tomb "Edwardus Longus Sctorum Malleus hic est" (1209, 1272-1307)

Hammerlein (Clare), the smith, one of the insurgents at Irlige.—Sir W Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV)

Hamond, captain of the guard of Rollo ("the bloody brother" of Otto, and duke of Normandy). He stabs the duke, and Rollo stabs the captain, so that they kill each other.—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Bloody Brother (1639)

Hampden (John) was born in London, but after his marriage lived as a country squire. He was imprisoned in the gate-house for refusing to pay a tax called ship-money, imposed without the authority of parliament. The case was tried in the Exchequer Chamber, in 1637, and given against him. He threw himself heart and soul into the business of the Long Parliament, and commanded a troop in the parliamentary army. In 1643 he fell in an encounter with prince Rupert, but he has ever been honoured as a patriot, and the defender of the rights of the people (1594-1613)

[What] Hampden no more when suffering Freedom calls
Encounter fate and triumph as he falls?
Can ye tell, Plumet of Hope L (1779)

Some village Hampden that with dauntless breast,
The little tyrant of his fields withstood.
Gray Elegy (1743)

Hamzu-ben-Ahmud, who, on the death of hakeem B'amar-ellah (called the incarnate deity and last prophet), was the most zealous propagator of the new faith, out of which the semi-Mohammedan sect called Druses subsequently arose

N B—They were not called "Druses" till the eleventh century, when one of their "apostles," called Durzi, led them from Egypt to Syria, and the sect was called by his name

Handel's Monument, in Westminster Abbey, is by Roubiliac. It was the last work executed by this sculptor

Han (Sons of), the Chinese, so called from Hân, the village in which Lieon-pang was chief. Lieon-pang conquered all who opposed him, seized the supreme power, assumed the name of Kao-hoàng-tee, and the dynasty, which lasted 422 years, was "the fifth imperial dynasty, or that of Hân." It gave thirty emperors, and the seat of government was Yn. With this dynasty the modern history of China begins (n c 202 to A D 220)

Handsome Englishman (The) The French used to call John Churchill, duke of Marlborough, Le Bel Anglais (1650-1722)

Handsome Swordsman (The) Jorehim Murat was popularly called Le Beau Sabreur (1767-1815)

Handy (Sir Abel), a great contriver of inventions which would not work, and of retrograde improvements. Thus "his infallible axle-tree" gave way when it was used, and the carriage was "smashed to pieces." His substitute for gunpowder exploded, endangered his life, and set fire to the castle. His "extinguishing powder" might have reduced the flames, but it was not mixed, nor were his patent fire-engines in workable order. He said to Farmer Ashfield

I have obtained patents for tweezers, tooth picks, and finger boxes, and have now on hand two inventions, the one for converting saw-dust into deal boards, and the other for cleaning rooms by steam-engines.—Act 1. 1.

Lady Nelly Handy (his wife), formerly a servant in the house of Farmer Ashfield. She was full of affectations, overbearing, and dogmatical. Lady Nelly tried to "forget the dunghill whence she grew, and thought herself the Lord knows who." Her extravagance was so great that sir Abel said his "best coal-pit would not find her in white muslin, nor his India bonds in shawls and otto of roses." It turned out that her first husband Gerald, who had been absent twenty years, reappeared and claimed her. Sir Abel willingly resigned his claim, and gave Gerald £5000 to take her off his hands.

Robert Handy (always called Bob), son of sir Abel by his first wife. He fancied he could do everything better than any one else. He taught the post-boy to drive, but broke the horse's knees. He taught Farmer Ashfield how to box, but got knocked down by him at the first blow. He told Dame Ashfield he had learnt lace-making at Meehlin, and that she did not make it in the right way, but he spoilt her cushion in showing her how to do it. He told lady Handy (his father's bride) she did not know how to use the fan, and showed her, he told her she did not know how to curtsey, and showed her. Being pestered by this popinjay beyond endurance, she implored her husband to protect her from further insults. Though light-hearted, Bob was "warm, steady, and sincere." He married Susan, the daughter of Farmer Ashfield.—Th Morton, Speed the Plough (1798).

Hanging Judge (The), sir Francis Page (1718-1741)

The earl of Norbury, who was chief justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland from 1820 to 1827, was also stigmatized with the same unenviable title

Hannah, housekeeper to Mr Fairford the lawyer.—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Hanover Rat The Jacobites used to affirm that the rat was brought over by the Hanoverians when they succeeded to the crown

Curse me the British vermin the rat,—
I know not whether he came in the Hanover ship.
Tennyson Maud II. v. 6.

Hans, a simple-minded boy of five and twenty, in love with Esther, but too shy to ask her in marriage. He is a "Modns" in a lower social grade, and Esther is a "cousin Helen," who laughs at him, loves him, and teaches him how to make love to her and win her.—S Knowles, The Maid of Mariendorpt (1833)

Hans, the pious ferryman on the banks of the Rhine.—Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Hans (Adrian), a Dutch merchant, killed at Boston — Sir W. Scott, Peter of the Peak (time, Charles II.)

Hans of Iceland, a novel by Victor Hugo (1824). Hans is a stern, savage, Northern monster, ghastly and fascinating.

Hans von Rippach [Rip-pah], i.e. Jack of Rippach. Rippach is a village near Leipsic. This Hans von Rippach is a "Mons Nong-tong-pas," that is, a person asked for, who does not exist. The "joke" is to ring a house up at some unseasonable hour, and ask for Herr Hans von Rippach or Mons Nong-tong-pas.

Hanson (Neu), a soldier in the castle of Garde Doloureuse — Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II.)

Hanswurst, the "Jack Pudding" of old German comedy, but almost annihilated by Gottsched, in the middle of the eighteenth century. He was clumsy, huge in person, an immense gourmand, and fond of vulgar practical jokes.

 The French "Jean Potage," the Italian "Macaroni," and the Dutch "Pekel Herringe," were similar characters.

Hapmouche (2 syl), i.e. "fly-catcher," the giant who first hit upon the plan of smoking pork and neat's tongues — Rabelais, Pantagruel, ii. 1.

Happer or Hob, the miller who supplies St. Mary's Convent.

Myse Happer, the miller's daughter. Afterwards, in disguise, she acts as the page of Sir Pierce Shafton, whom she marries — Sir W. Scott, The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Happuck, a magician, brother of Ulla the enchantress. He was the instigator of rebellion, and intended to kill the sultan Misnar at a review, but Misnar had given orders to a body of archers to shoot the man who was left standing when the rest of the soldiers fell prostrate in adoration. Misnar went to the review, and commanded the army to give thanks to Allah for their victory, when all fell prostrate except Happuck, who was thus detected, and instantly despatched — Sir C. Morell [James Ridley], Tales of the Genn ("The Enchanter's Tale," vi, 1751).

Here we prevailed against Ulla and Happuck, Othman and Isanar, Almalack and Derra, and shall we fear the continuance of a poor vizier? — Tales of the Genn, vi. (1751).

Happy Valley (The), in the kingdom of Amihara. It was here the royal princes and princesses of Abyssinia lived. It was surrounded by high mountains, and was accessible only by one spot under a cave. This spot was concealed by woods and closed by iron gates — Dr. Johnson, Rasselas (1759).

Har'apha, a descendant of Anak the giant of Gath. He went to mock Samson in prison, but durst not venture within his reach — Milton, Samson Agonistes (1632).

Har'bothol (Master Fabian) the squire of Sir Aymer de Valence — Sir W. Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Hard Times, a novel by C. Dickens (1834), dramatized in 1867 under the title of Under the Earth or The Sons of Toil. Bounderby, a street arab, raised himself to banker and cotton prince. When 55 years of age, he proposed marriage to Louisa, daughter of Thomas Gradgrind, Esq., J.P., and was accepted. One night, the bank was robbed of £150, and Bounderby believed Stephen Blackpool to be the thief, because he had dismissed him, being obnoxious to the mill hands; but the culprit was Tom Gradgrind, the banker's brother-in-law, who lay prison for a while, and then escaped out of the country. In the dramatized version the bank was not robbed at all, but Tom merely removed the money to another drawer for safe custody.

Hardcastle (Squire), a jovial, prosy, but hospitable country gentleman of the old school. He loves to tell his long-winded stories about prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough. He says, "I love everything that's old — old friends, old times, old manners, old books, old wine" (act i. 1), and he might have added, "old stories."

Mrs. Hardcastle, a very "genteel" lady indeed. Mr. Hardcastle is her second husband, and Tony Lumpkin her son by her former husband. She is fond of "genteel" society, and the latest fashions. Mrs. Hardcastle says, "There's nothing in the world I love to talk of so much as London and the fashions, though I was never there myself" (act ii. 1). Her mistaking her husband for a highwayman, and imploring him on her knees to take their watches, money, all they have got, but to spare their lives. "Here, good gentleman, whet your rage upon me, take my money, my life, but spare my child!" is infinitely comic (act iv 1)

The princess, like Mrs. Hardcastle, was jolted to a jelly —Lord W. P. Leunox, Celebrities I. I.

Miss Hardcastle, the pretty, bright-eyed, lively daughter of squire Hardcastle. She is in love with young Marlow, and "stoops" to a pardonable deceit "to conquer" his bashfulness and win him —Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer (1773)

Har'die (Mr.), a young lawyer, in the introduction of sir W. Scott's Heart of Midlothian (1818)

Hardoun (2 syl.) Jean Hardoun, the jesuit, was librarian to Louis XIV. He doubted the truth of all received history, denied that the Aeneid was the work of Virgil, or the Odes of Horace the production of that poet, placed no credence in medals and coins, regarded all councils before that of Trent as chimerical, and looked on all Jansenists as infidels (1646-1729)

Hardy (Mr.), father of Letitia. A worthy little fellow enough, but with the unfortunate gift of "foreseeing" everything (act v 4)

Letitia Hardy, his daughter, the fiancée of Doricourt. A girl of great spirit and ingenuity, beautiful and clever. Doricourt dislikes her without knowing her, simply because he has been betrothed to her by his parents, but she wins him by stratagem. She first assumes the airs and manners of a raw country hoyden, and disgusts the fastidious man of fashion. She then appears at a masquerade, and wins him by her many attractions. The marriage is performed at midnight, and, till the ceremony is over, Doricourt has no suspicion that the fair masquerader is his affianced Miss Hardy. —Mrs. Cowley, The Belle's Stratagem (1780)

Hare'dale (Geoffrey), brother of Reuben the uncle of Emma Hare'dale. He was a papist, and incurred the malignant hatred of Gashford (lord George Gordon's secretary) by exposing him in Westminster Hall. Geoffrey Hare'dale killed sir John Chester in a duel, but made good his escape, and ended his days in a monastery.

Reuben Hare'dale (2 syl.), brother of Geoffrey, and father of Emma Hare'dale. He was murdered.

Emma Hare'dale, daughter of Reuben, and niece of Geoffrey with whom she lived at "The Warren." Edward Chester entertained a tendre for Emma Hare'dale. —C. Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841)

Harefoot (Harold). So Harold I was called, because he was swift of foot as a hare (1035-1040)

Hargrave, a man of fashion. The hero and title of a novel by Mrs. Trollope (1843)

Harley, "the man of feeling." A man of the finest sensibilities and unbounded benevolence, but bashful as a maiden —Mackenzie, The Man of Feeling (1771)

The principal object of Mackenzie is to reach and sustain a tone of moral pathos by representing the effect of incidents upon the human mind, especially those which are just, honourable and intelligent. —Sir W. Scott.

Harlot (The Infamous Northern), Elizabeth Petrovna empress of Russia (1709-1761)

Harlowe (Clarissa), a young lady, who, to avoid a marriage to which her heart cannot consent, but to which she is urged by her parents, casts herself on the protection of a lover, who most scandalously abuses the confidence reposed in him. He afterwards proposes marriage, but she rejects his proposal, and retires to a solitary dwelling, where she pines to death with grief and shame. —S. Richardson, The History of Clarissa Harlowe (1749)

The dignity of Clarissa under her disgrace reminds us of the dying of the ancient poet, that a good man struggling with the tide of adversity and surmounting it, is a sight upon which the immortal gods might look down with pleasure. —Sir W. Scott.

The moral elevation of this heroine, the saintly purity which she preserves amidst scenes of the deepest depravity and the most seductive gaiety and the never-failing sweetness and benevolence of her temper, render Clarissa one of the brightest triumphs of the whole range of imaginative literature. —Chambers, English Literature II. 161.

Harl'weston Fountains, near St. Neot's, in Huntingdon. There are two, one salt and the other fresh. The salt fountain is said to cure dimness of sight, and the sweet fountain to cure the itch and leprosy. Drayton tells the legend of these two fountains at the beginning of song xxii of his Polyolbion (1622)

Harmon (John), alias JOHN ROKESMITH, Mr. Boffin's secretary. He lodged with the Wilfers, and ultimately married Bella Wilfer. He is described as "a dark gentleman, 30 at the utmost, with an expressive, one might say, a handsome face." —C. Dickens, Our Mutual Friend (1864).

* * For explanation of the mystery, see vol. I. u 13

Harmo'nia's Necklace, an unlucky possession, something which brings evil to its possessor Harmonia was the daughter of Mars and Venus. On the day of her marriage with king Cadmos, she received a necklace made by Vulcan for Venus. This unlucky ornament afterwards passed to Sem'elē, then to Jocasta, then Enphytē, but was equally fatal in every case (See UNLUCKY) — Ovid, Metaph, iv 5, Statius, Thebaid, 11

Harmonious Blacksmith It is said that the sound of hammers on an anvil suggested to Handel the "theme" of the musical composition to which he has given this name — See Schoelcher, Life of Handel, 65

A similar tale is told of Pythagoras

Intently considering whether it would be possible to devise a certain instrumental aid to the hearing, he one day passed near a smithy and was struck by the sound produced as the hammers beat out a piece of iron on an anvil. He recognized in these sounds the diapason, the diapente and the diatessaron harmony. Going then into the smithy he discovered that the difference of sound arose from the different sizes of the hammers, and not from the difference of force employed in giving the strokes nor yet from any difference in the shape of the hammers. From this hint he constructed his musical scale. — Iamblichus, Life of Pythagoras xxi.

The same tale is also told of Tubalcain

Tuball hadde greete by kyngs to here the hamers sowne and he fonde proporcions and acorde of melodye by weyght of the hamers and so he uel them moche in the corde of melodye but he was not fynder of the instrumentes of musyke. — Higden Polyconycon.

(It would be more to the point, perhaps, if the tale had been told of Jubal, "the fynder of certain Instrumentes of musyke")

Harmony (Mr), a general peace-maker. When he found persons at variance, he went to them separately, and told them how highly the other spoke and thought of him or her. If it were man and wife, he would tell the wife how highly her husband esteemed her, and would apply the "oiled feather" in a similar way to the husband. "We all have our faults," he would say, "and So-and-so knows it, and grieves at his infirmity of temper, but though he contends with you, he praised you to me this morning in the highest terms." By this means he succeeded in smoothing many a ruffled mind. — Inchbald, Every One has His Fault (1794).

Harpagon, the miser, father of Cléante (2 syl) and Elise (2 syl). Both Harpagon and his son desire to marry Mariane (3 syl), but the father having lost a casket of money, is asked which he prefers—his casket or Mariane, and as the miser prefers the money, Cléante marries the lady. Harpagon imagines that every one is going to rob him, and when he loses his casket, seizes his own arm in the frenzy of passion. He proposes to give his daughter in marriage to an old man named Anselme, because no "dot" will be required, and when Valère (who is Elise's lover) urges reason after reason against the unnatural alliance, the miser makes but one reply, "saus dot." "Ah," says Valère, "il est vrai, cela ferme la bouche à tout, sans dot." Harpagon, at another time, solicits Jacques (1 syl) to tell him what folks say of him, and when Jacques replies he cannot do so, as it would make him angry, the miser answers, "Point de tout, au contraire, c'est me faire plaisir." But when told that he is called a miser and a skinflint, he towers with rage, and beats Jacques in his uncontrolled passion

Hassan, surnamed Al Habbal ("the rope-maker"), and subsequently Cogia ("merchant"), his full name was then Cogia Hassan Alhabbal. Two friends, named Saad and Saadi, tried an experiment on him. Saadi gave him 200 pieces of gold, in order to see if it would raise him from extreme poverty to affluence. Hassan took ten pieces for immediate use, and sewed the rest in his turban, but a kite pounced on his turban and carried it away. The two friends, after a time, visited Hassan again, but found him in the same state of poverty; and, having heard his tale, Saadi gave him another 200 pieces of gold. Again he took out ten pieces, and, wrapping the rest in a linen rag, hid it in a jar of bran. While Hassan was at work, his wife exchanged this jar of bran for fuller's earth, and again the condition of the man was not bettered by the gift. Saad now gave the rope-maker a small piece of lead, and this made his fortune. Thus a fisherman wanted a piece of lead for his nets, and promised to give Hassan for Saad's piece whatever he caught in his first draught. This was a large fish, and in it the wife found a splendid diamond, which was sold for 100,000 pieces of gold. Hassan now became very rich, and when the two friends visited him again, they found him a man of consequence. He asked them to stay with him, and took them to his country house, when one of his sons showed him a curious nest, made out of a turban. This was the very turban which the kite had carried off, and the money was found in the lining. As they returned to the city, they stopped and purchased a jar of bran. This happened to be the very jar which the wife had given in exchange, and the money was discovered wrapped in linen at the bottom. Hassan was delighted, and gave the 180 pieces to the poor—Arabian Nights ("Cogia Hassan Alhabbal")

Hatto, archbishop of Mentz, was devoured by mice in the Mouse-tower, situate in a little green island in the midst of the Rhine, near the town of Bingen. Some say he was eaten of rats, and Sonthey, in his ballad called God's Judgment on a Wicked Bishop, has adopted the latter tradition.

This Hatto in the time of the great famine of 934, when he saw the poor exceedingly oppressed by famine assembled a great company of them together into a barn at Kanb and burnt them. Because he thought the famine would sooner cease if those poor folks were despatched out of the world for like mice they only devour food, and are of no good whatsoever. But God sent against him a plague of mice and the prelate retreated to a tower in the Rhine as a sanctuary but the mice chased him continually and at last he was most miserably devoured by those little creatures.—Coryat's Crudities 571, 572.

* * * Giraldus Cambrensis, in his Itinerary, xi 2, says "the larger sort of mice are called rats." This may account for the substitution of rats for mice in the legend.

The legend of Hatto is very common, as the following stories will prove—

Widerolf, bishop of Strasburg (997), was devoured by mice in the seventeenth year of his episcopate, because he suppressed the convent of Seltzen on the Rhine.

Bishop Adolf, of Cologne, was devoured by mice or rats in 1112.

Freiherr von Güttingen collected the poor in a great barn, and burnt them to death, mocking their cries of agony. He, like Hatto, was invaded by mice, ran to his castle of Guttingen, in the lake of Constance, whither the vermin pursued him, and ate him alive. The Swiss legend says the castle sank in the lake, and may still be seen. Freiherr von Güttingen had three castles, one of which was Moosburg.

Count Graaf, in order to enrich himself, bought up all the corn. One year a sad famine prevailed, and the count expected to reap a rich harvest by his speculation, but an army of rats, pressed by hunger, invaded his barns, and, swarming into his Rhine tower, fell on the old baron, worried him to death, and then devoured him.—Legends of the Rhine.

A similar story is told by William of Malmesbury, History, ii 313 (Bohn's edit.)

* * * Some of the legends state that the "mice" were in reality "the souls of the murdered people."

Hatton (Sir Christopher), "the dancing chancellor." He first attracted the attention of queen Elizabeth by his graceful dancing at a masque. He was Have'lok (2 syl) or Hablok, the orphan son of Birkabegn king of Denmark, was exposed at sea through the treachery of his guardians. The raft drifted to the coast of Lincolnshire, where it was discovered by Grim, a fisherman, who reared the young foundling as his own son. It happened that some twenty years later certain English nobles usurped the dominions of an English princess, and, to prevent her gaining any access of power by a noble alliance, resolved to marry her to a peasant. Young Havelok was selected as the bridegroom, but having discovered the story of his birth, he applied to his father Birkabegn for aid in recovering his wife's possessions. The king afforded him the aid required, and the young foundling became in due time both king of Denmark and king of that part of England which belonged to him in right of his wife—Havelok the Dane (by the trouvères).

Havisham (Miss), an old spinster, who dressed always in her bridal dress, with lace veil from head to foot, white shoes, bridal flowers in her white hair, and jewels on her hands and neck. She was the daughter of a rich brewer, engaged to Comperison, a young man, who threw her over on the wedding morning, from which moment she became fossilized (ch xxii). She fell into the fire, and died from the shock.

Estella Havisham, the adopted child of Miss Havisham, by whom she was brought up. She was proud, handsome, and self-possessed. Pip loved her, and probably she reciprocated his love, but she married Bentley Drummle, who died, leaving Estella a young widow. The tale ends with these words.

I [Pip] took her hand in mine, and we went out of the ruined place. As the morning mists had risen when I first left the forge so the evening were rising now, and I saw no shadow of another parting from her — O Dickens, Great Expectations (1860)

Hawk (Sir Mulberry), the bear-leader of lord Frederick Verisopht. He is a most unprincipled rascal, who sponges on his lordship, snubs him, and despises him. "Sir Mulberry was remarkable for his tact in running young gentlemen of fortune."

With all the boldness of an original genius, sir Mulberry had struck out an entirely new course of treatment, quite opposed to the usual method, his custom being to keep down those he took in hand and to give them their own way. Thus he made them his butts in a double sense, for he emptied them with good address and made them the laughing stocks of society — O. Dickens Nicholas Nickleby xix. (1839)

To know a hawk from a handsaw, a corruption of "from a heronshaw" (i.e. a heron), meaning that one is so ignorant he does not know a hawk from a heron, the bird of prey from the game fowl at. Heart of Midlothian, the old jail or tolbooth of Edinburgh, taken down in 1817.

Sir Walter Scott has a novel so called (1818), the plot of which is as follows — Effie Deans, the daughter of a Scotch cow-feeder, is seduced by George Staunton, son of the rector of Willingham, and Jeanie is cited as a witness on the trial which ensues, by which Effie is sentenced to death for child murder. Jeanie promises to go to London and ask the king to pardon her half-sister, and, after various perils, arrives at her destination. She lays her case before the duke of Argyll, who takes her in his carriage to Richmond, and obtains for her an interview with the queen, who promises to intercede with his majesty (George II.) on her sister's behalf. In due time the royal pardon is sent to Edinburgh, Effie is released, and marries her seducer, now sir George Staunton, but soon after the marriage sir George is shot by a gipsy boy, who is in reality his illegitimate son. On the death of her husband, lady Staunton retires to a convent on the Continent. Jeannie marries Reuben Butler the presbyterian minister. The novel opens with the Porteous riots.

Hec'ate (2 syl), called in classic mythology Hec'ate (3 syl), a triple deity, being Luna in heaven, Diana on earth, and Proserpine (3 syl) in hell. Hecate presided over magic and enchantments, and was generally represented as having the head of a horse, dog, or boar, though sometimes she is represented with three bodies, and three heads looking different ways. Shakespeare introduces her in his tragedy of Macbeth (act iii sc 5), as queen of the witches, but the witches of Macbeth have been largely borrowed from a drama called The Witch, by Thom Middleton (died 1626). The following is a specimen of this indebtedness—

Tus, the Hectors the Seonners, the Nickers, the Hauenbites, and, lastly, the Mohawks, worst of them all

Heeltap (Crispin), a cobbler, and one of the corporation of Garratt, of which Jerry Sneak is chosen mayor — S Foote, The Mayor of Garratt (1763)

Heep (Uriah), a detestable sneak, who is everlastingly forcing on one's attention that he is so 'umble Uriah is Mr Wickfield's clerk, and, with all his ostentatious 'umility, is most designing, malignant, and intermeddling. His infamy is dragged to light by Mr Micawber

I am well aware that I am the umblest person going let the other be who he may. My mother is likewise a very umble person. We live in a n umble abode. Master Copperfield but have much to be thankful for. My father's former calling was umble—he was a sexton — C Dickens, David Copperfield xvi (1849)

Heidelberg (Mrs), the widow of a wealthy Dutch merchant, who kept her brother's house (Mr Sterling, a City merchant). She was very vulgar, and, "knowing the strength of her purse, domineered on the credit of it." Mrs Heidelberg had most exalted notions "of the quality," and a "perfect contempt for everything that did not smack of high life." Her English was certainly faulty, as the following specimens will show — farden, vulgar, spurrit, perfest, Swish, twers, purliteness, etc. She spoke of a picture by Raphael-Angelo, a po-shay, dish-abelle, parfet naturals [idiots], most gentelest, and so on. When thwarted in her overbearing ways, she threatened to leave the house and go to Holland to live with her husband's cousin, Mr Vanderspricken — Colman and Garriek, The Clandestine Marriage (1766)

Heimdall (2 syl), in Celtic mythology, was the son of nine virgin sisters. He dwelt in the celestial fort Himinbiorg, under the extremity of the rainbow. His ear was so acute that he could hear "the wool grow on the sheep's back, and the grass in the meadows." Heimdall was the watch or sentinel of Asgard (Olympus), and even in his sleep was able to see everything that transpired. (See FINE-EAR, p 333)

Heimdall's Horn. At the end of the world, Heimdall will wake the gods with his horn, when they will be attacked by Muspell, Loki, the wolf Fenris, and the serpent Jormungandar.

And much he talked of
And Heimdall's horn and the day of doom.
Longfellow, The Hyside Inn (Interlude, 1863).

Heinrich (Poor) or "Poor Henry," the hero and title of a minnesong, by Hartmann von der Aue [Our]. Heinrich was a rich nobleman, struck with leprosy, and was told he would never recover till some virgin of spotless purity volunteered to die on his behalf. As Heinrich neither hoped nor even wished for such a sacrifice, he gave the main part of his possessions to the poor, and went to live with a poor tenant farmer, who was one of his vassals. The daughter of this farmer heard by accident on what the cure of the leper depended, and went to Salerno to offer herself as the victim. No sooner was the offer made than the lord was cured, and the damsel became his wife (twelfth century).

* * This tale forms the subject of Longfellow's Golden Legend (1851)

Heir-at-Law. Baron Duberly being dead, his "heir-at-law" was Henry Morland, supposed to be drowned at sea, and the next heir was Daniel Dowlas, a chandler of Gosport. Scarcely had Daniel been raised to his new dignity, when Henry Morland, who had been cast on Cape Breton, made his appearance, and the whole aspect of affairs was changed. That Dowlas might still live in comfort, suitable to his limited ambition, the heir of the barony settled on him a small life annuity — G Colman, Heir-at-Law (1797)

Hel'a, queen of the dead. She is daughter of Loki and Angurbo'da (a giantess). Her abode, called Helheim, was a vast castle in Nifheim, in the midst of eternal snow and darkness.

Down the fawning steep he rode
That leads to Hel's drear abode.
Gray, Descent of Odin (1767).

Helen, wife of Menelaos of Sparta. She eloped with Paris, a Trojan prince, while he was the guest of the Spartan king. Menelaos, to avenge this wrong, induced the allied armies of Greece to invest Troy, and after a siege of ten years, the city was taken and burnt to the ground.

* * A parallel incident occurred in Ireland. Dervorghal, wife of Tiernan O'Ruark, an Irish chief who held the county of Leitrim, eloped with Dermot M'Murhad prince of Leinster. Dermot induced O'Connor king of Connaught to avenge this wrong. So O'Connor drove Dermot from his throne. Dermot applied to Henry II of England, and this was the incident which brought about the conquest of Ireland (1172) —Leland, History of Ireland (1773)

Hel'en, the heroine of Miss Edgeworth's novel of the same name This was her last and most popular tale (1834).

Helen, cousin of Modus the bookworm She loved her cousin, and taught him there was a better "art of love" than that written by Ovid —S Knowles, The Hunchback (1831)

Miss Taylor was the original Helen and her performance was universally pronounced to be exquisite and unsurpassable. On one occasion Mr Knowles admired a rose which Miss Taylor wore in the part, and after she played she sent it him. The poet, in reply, sent the lady a copy of verses. —Walter Lacy

Helen (Lady), in love with sir Edward Mortimer Her uncle insulted sir Edward in a county assembly, struck him down, and trampled on him Sir Edward, returning home, encountered the drunken ruffian and murdered him He was tried for the crime, and acquitted "without a stain upon his character," but the knowledge of the deed preyed upon his mind, so that he could not marry the niece of the murdered man After leading a life of utter wretchedness, sir Edward told Helen that he was the murderer of her uncle, and died —G Colman, The Iron Chest (1796)

Helen (Mowbray), in love with Walsingham "Of all grace the pattern—person, feature, mind, heart, every thing, as nature had essayed to frame a work where none could find a flaw" Allured by lord Athlunree to a house of ill-fame, under pretence of doing a work of charity, she was seen by Walsingham as she came out, and he abandoned her as a wanton She then assumed male attire, with the name of Eustace Walsingham became her friend, was told that Eustace was Helen's brother, and finally discovered that Eustace was Helen herself The mystery being cleared up, they became man and wife. —S Knowles, Woman's Wit, etc (1838)

Helen's Fire (feu d'Helene), a comazant, called "St Helme's" or "St Elmo's fire" by the Spaniards, the "fires of St Peter and St Nicholas" by the Italians, and "Castor and Pollux" by the ancient Romans This electric light will sometimes play about the masts of ships If only one appears, foul weather may be looked for, but if two or more flames appear, the worst of the storm is over

When'er the sons of Leda shied
Their star lamps on our vessel's head.

The storm winds cease the troubled spray
Falls from the rocks clouds pass away
And on the bosom of the deep
In peace the angry billows sleep

Horace Odes L 12.

Helen of One's Troy, the ambition of our heart, the object for which we live and die The allusion, of course, is to that Helen who eloped with Paris, and thus brought about the siege and destruction of Troy

For which men all the life they here enjoy
Still fight, as for the Helens of their Troy
Lord Brooke, Treatise of Humane Learning (1554-1623).

Hel'ena (St), daughter of Coel duke Colchester and afterwards king of Britain She married Constantus (a Roman senator, who succeeded "Old king Cole"), and became the mother of Constantine the Great Constantius died at York (A.D. 306) Helena is said to have discovered at Jerusalem the sepulchre and cross of Jesus Christ —Geoffrey, British History, v 6 (1142)

* * This legend is told of the Colchester arms, which consist of a cross and three crowns (two atop and one at the foot of the cross)

At a considerable depth beneath the surface of the earth were found three crosses, which were instantly recognized as those on which Christ and the two thieves had suffered death To ascertain which was the true cross a female corpse was placed on all three alternately the two first tried produced no effect, but the third instantly reanimated the body. —J Brady Clar's Calendar 181.

Herself in person went to seek that holy cross
Whereon our Saviour died which found as if we sought From Salem unto Rome triumphantly she brought.
Dryden, Polyolbion, vill (1611).

Hel'ena, only daughter of Gerard de Narbon the physician She was left under the charge of the countess of Rousillon, whose son Bertram she fell in love with The king sent for Bertram to the palace, and Helena, hearing the king was ill, obtained permission of the countess to give him a prescription left by her late father The medicine cured the king, and the king, in gratitude, promised to make her the wife of any one of his courtiers that she chose Helena selected Bertram, and they were married, but the haughty count, hating the alliance, left France, to join the army of the duke of Florence Helena, in the mean time, started on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St Jacques le Grand, carrying with her a letter from her husband, stating that he would never see her more "till she could get the ring from off his finger" On her way to the shrine, she lodged at Florence with a widow, the mother of Diana, with whom Bertram was wantonly in love Helena was permitted to pass herself off as Diana, and receive his visits, in one of which they exchanged rings. Loth soon after this returned to the countess de Rousillon, where the king was, and the king, seeing on Bertram's finger the ring which he gave to Helena, had him arrested on suspicion of murder. Helena now explained the matter, and all was well, for all ended well.—Shakespeare, All's Well that ends Well (1598)

Helena is a young woman seeking a man in marriage. The ordinary laws of courtship are reversed, the habitual feelings are violated—yet with such exquisite address this dangerous subject is handled that Helena's forwardness loses her no honour. Delicacy dispenses with her laws in her favour.—C. Lamb

Helena, a young Athenian lady, in love with Demetrius. She was the playmate of Herminia, with whom she grew up, as "two cherries on one stalk." Egeus (3 syl), the father of Herminia, promised his daughter in marriage to Demetrius, but when Demetrius saw that Herminia loved Lysander, he turned to Helena, who loved him dearly, and married her.—Shakespeare, A Midsummer Night's Dream (1592)

Helice (8 syl), the Great Bear

Night on the earth poured darkness on the sea
The wakeful sailor to Orion's star
And Helice turned heedful
Apolonius Rhodius, The Argonautic Expedition.

Helicon, a mountain of Boeotia, sacred to the Muses

From Helicon's harmonious springs
A thousand rills their merry progress take Gry Progress of Poetry (1757)

Helinore (Dame), wife of Malbecco, who was jealous of her, and not without cause. When sir Paridel, sir Satyrane (3 syl), and Britomart (as the Squire of Dames) took refuge in Malbecco's house, Dame Helinore and sir Paridel had many "false belgards" at each other, and talked love with glances which needed no interpreter. Helinore, having set fire to the closet where Malbecco kept his treasures, eloped with Paridel, while the old miser stopped to put out the fire. Paridel soon tired of the dame, and cast her off, leaving her to roam whither she listed. She was taken up by the satyrs, who made her their dairy-woman, and crowned her queen of the May.—Spenser, Fairy Queen, in 9, 10 (1590)

Heliotrope renders the bearer of it invisible. Boccaccio calls it a stone, but Solinus says it is the herb so called (See INVISIBILITY)

Amid this dread exuberance of woe
Ran naked spirits, winged with horrid fear
Nor hope had they of crevice where to hide,
Or heliotrope to charm them out of view

Dante, Inferno xxiv (1320)

Heliotrope is a stone of such extraordinary virtue that the bearer of it is effectually concealed from the sight of all present.—Boccaccio Decameron (day viii. 3).

Viridi colore est gemma heliotropo. non ita acuto sed nobilio magis et represso stellis punicis superpersa. Causa nominis do effectu lapidis est et potestate. Delecta in labris anelis radios solis mutat sanguineo repercussu nitraque aqua splendorem atris abijcit et avertit. Etiam illud posse dicitur ut herba ejusdem nominis mixta et praecantationibus legitimis consecrata, eum a quocunque gestabitur subtrahat visibus obviatorum.—Solinus Geog xl.

Helisane de Crenne, contemporary with Paquer. She wrote her own biography, including the "history of her own death"—Angoisses Doloureuses (Lyons, 1546)

Hel Keplein, a mantle of invisibility, belonging to the dwarf-king Laurin (See INVISIBILITY)—The Heldenbuch (thirteenth century)

Hell, according to Mohammedan belief, is divided into seven compartments (1) for Mohammedans, (2) for Jews, (3) for Christians, (4) for Sabians, (5) for Magians, (6) for idolaters, (7) for hypocrites. All but idolaters and unbelievers will be in time released from torment.

Hell, Dantè says, is a vast funnel, divided into eight circles, with ledges more or less rugged. Each circle, of course, is narrower than the one above, and the last goes down to the very centre of the earth. Before the circles begin, there is a neutral land and a limbo. In the neutral land wander those not bad enough for hell nor good enough for heaven, in the limbo, those who knew no sin but were not baptized Christians. Coming then to hell proper, circle 1, he says, is compassed by the river Acheron, and in this division of inferno dwell the spirits of the heathen philosophers. Circle 2 is presided over by Minos, and here are the spirits of those guilty of carnal and sinful love. Circle 3 is guarded by Cerberus, and this is the region set apart for gluttons. Circle 4, presided over by Plutus, is the realm of the avaricious. Circle 5 contains the Stygian Lake, and here flounder in deep mud those who in life put no restraint on their anger. Circle 6 (in the city of Dis) is for those who did violence to man by force or fraud. Circle 7 (in the city of Dis) is for suicides. Circle 8 (also in the city of Dis) is for blasphemers and heretics. After the eight circles come the ten pits or chasms of Malebolgè (4 syl), the last of which is in the centre of the earth, and here, he says, is the frozen river of Coeytus (See INFERNO)

Hell Kettles, three black pits of boiling heat and sulphurous vapour, on the banks of the Skern, in Northumberland;

The Stern spleth near her bank
Three black and horrid pits, which for their sulph'rous [sic] sweet
'Hell Kettles' rightly called.
Drayton, Polyolbion xix. (1622)

* * One of the caverns is 19 feet 6 inches deep, another is 14 feet deep, and the third is 17 feet. These three communicate with each other. There is a fourth 5½ feet deep, which is quite separate from the other three.

And in laudably cures by sovereign hellebore
Drayton, Polyolbion, xiii. (1613)

Hellespont. Leander used to swim across the Hellespont to visit Hero, a priestess of Sestos. Lord Byron and lieutenant Ekenhead repeated the feat, and accomplished it in seventy minutes, the distance being four miles (allowing for drifting)

He could, perhaps, have passed the Hellespont,
As once (a feat on which ourselves we prided)
Leander and Ekenhead, and I did.
Byron, Don Juan II. 165 (1819)

Helicæ'nus, the able and honest minister of Pericles, to whom he left the charge of Tyre during his absence. Being offered the crown, Helicæ'nus nobly declined the offer, and remained faithful to the prince throughout.—Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608)

Helmet of Invisibility. The helmet of Perseus (2 syl) rendered the wearer invisible. This was in reality the "Helmet of Hædês," and after Perseus had slain Medu'sa he restored it, together with the winged sandals and magic wallet. The "gorgon's head" he presented to Minerva, who placed it in the middle of her ægis. (See INVISIBILITY.)

* * Mambrino's helmet had the same magical power, though don Quixote, even in his midsummer madness, never thought himself invisible when he donned the barber's basin.

He'mera, sister of prince Memnon, mentioned by Diety's Cretensis. Milton, in his Il Penseroso, speaks of "prince Memnon's sister" (1638)

Hem'junah, princess of Cassimir', daughter of the sultan Zebene'zer, betrothed at the age of 13 to the prince of Georgia. As Hemjunah had never seen the prince, she ran away to avoid a forced marriage, and was changed by Ulin the enchanter into a toad. In this form she became acquainted with Misnar sultan of India, who had likewise been transformed into a toad by Ulin. Misnar was disenchanted by a dervise, and slew Ulin, whereupon the princess recovered her proper shape, and returned home. A rebellion broke out in Cassimir, but the "angel of death" destroyed the rebel army, and Zebenezer was restored to his throne. His surprise was unbounded when he found that the prince of Georgia and the sultan of India were one and the same person, and Hemjunah said, "Be assured, O sultan, that I shall not refuse the hand of the prince of Georgia, even if my father commands my obedience."—Sir C. Morell [J. Ridley], Tales of the Genii ("Princess of Cassimir," vii, 1751)

Hemlock. Socrates the Wise and Phocion the Good were both by the Athenians condemned to death by hemlock juice, Socrates at the age of 70 (n c 399) and Phocion at the age of 85 (n c 317)

Hemps'larke (2 syl), a captain serving under Wolfert the usurper of the earldom of Flanders.—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Beggars' Bush (1622)

Hen and Chickens (The), the Pleades. Called in Basquo Oloa Chitua in (same meaning).—Miss Frere, Old Deccan Days, 27

Henbane makes those who chance to eat of it "bray like asses or neigh like horses."

Hen'derson (Elias), chaplain at Lochleven Castle.—Sir W. Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth)

Henneberg (Count). One day a beggar-woman asked count Henneberg's wife for alms. The countess twitted her for carrying twins, whereupon the woman cursed her, with the assurance that "her ladyship should be the mother of 365 children." The legend says that the countess bore them at one birth, but none of them lived any length of time. All the girls were named Elizabeth, and all the boys John They are buried, we are told, at the Hague

Henrietta Maria, widow of king Charles I, introduced in sir W Scott's Peter of the Peak (1823)

Henrietta Street, Cavendish Square, London, is so called in compliment to Henrietta Cavendish, daughter of John Holles duke of Newcastle, and wife of Edward second earl of Oxford and Mortimer From these come "Edward Street," "Henrietta Street," "Cavendish Square," and "Holles Street" (See PORTLAND PLACE)

Henriette (3 syl), daughter of Chrysale (2 syl) and Philaminte (3 syl) She is in love with Clitandre, and ultimately becomes his wife Philaminte, who is a blue-stocking, wants Henriette to marry Trissotin a bel esprit, and Armande the sister, also a pas bleu, thinks that Henriette ought to devote her life to science and philosophy, but Henriette loves woman's work far better, and thinks that her natural province is domestic life, with wifely and motherly duties Her father Chrysale takes the same views of woman's life as his daughter Henriette, but he is quite under the thumb of his strong-minded wife However, love at last prevails, and Henriette is given in marriage to the man of her choice The French call Henriette "the type of a perfect woman," i.e. a thorough woman — Molière, Les Femmes Savantes (1672)

Henrique (Don), an uxorious lord, cruel to his younger brother don Jamie Don Henrique is the father of Ascanio, and the supposed husband of Violante (4 syl) — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Spanish Curate (1622)

Henry, a soldier engaged to Louisa Some rumours of gallantry to Henry's disadvantage having reached the village, he is told that Louisa is about to be married to another In his despair he gives himself up as a deserter, and is condemned to death Louisa now goes to the king, explains to him the whole matter, obtains her sweetheart's pardon, and reaches the jail just as the muffled drums begin to beat the death march — Dibdin, The Deserter (1770)

Henry, son of sir Philip Blandford's brother Both the brothers loved the same lady, but the younger marrying her, sir Philip, in his rage, stabbed him, as it was thought, mortally In due time, the young "widow" had a son (Henry), a very high-minded, chivalrous young man, greatly beloved by every one After twenty years, his father re-appeared under the name of Morrington, and Henry married his cousin Emma Blandford — Thom Morton, Speed the Plough (1798)

Henry (Poor), prince of Hoheneck, in Bavaria Being struck with leprosy, he quitted his lordly castle, gave largely to the poor, and retired to live with a small cottage farmer named Gottheb [Got leeb], one of his vassals He was told that he would never be cured till a virgin, chaste and spotless, offered to die on his behalf Elsie, the farmer's daughter, offered herself, and after great resistance the prince accompanied her to Salerno to complete the sacrifice When he arrived at the city, either the exercise, the excitement, or the charm of some relic, no matter what, had effected an entire cure, and when he took Elsie into the cathedral, the only sacrifice she had to make was that of her maiden name for lady Alcia, wife of prince Henry of Hoheneck — Hartmann von der Ane (minnesinger), Poor Henry (twelfth century)

* * This tale is the subject of Longfellow's Golden Legend (1851)

Henry II, king of England, introduced by sir W Scott both in The Betrothed and in The Talisman (1825)

Herbert (Sir William), friend of Sir Hugo de Laey—Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Herculês shot Nessus for offering insult to his wife Di'-i-a-ni-ra, and the dying centaur told Dianira that if she dipped in his blood her husband's shirt, she would secure his love for ever. Herculês, being about to offer sacrifice, sent Lichas for the shirt, but no sooner was it warmed by the heat of his body than it caused such excruciating agony that the hero went mad, and, seizing Lichas, he flung him into the sea.

Herculês Mad is the subject of a Greek tragedy by Euripides, and of a Latin one by Seneca

As when Alcides felt the venomous robe and tore,
Thro' pain up by the roots Thersidan plies,
And Lichas from the top of Cithra (a mountain) threw
Into the Euboean Sea [the Archipelago].
Milton, Paradise Lost li. 542, etc. (1665)

* * Diodorus says there were three Herculêses, Cicero recognizes six (three of which were Greeks, one Egyptian, one Cretan, and one Indian), Varro says there were forty-three Herculês's Choice. When Herculês was a young man, he was accosted by two women, Pleasure and Virtue, and asked to choose which he would follow. Pleasure promised him all carnal delights, but Virtue promised him immortality. Herculês gave his hand to the latter, and hence led a life of great toil, but was ultimately received amongst the immortals.—Xenophon

* * Mrs Baubault has borrowed this allegory, but instead of Herculês has substituted Melissa, "a young girl," who is accosted by Dissipation and Housewifery. While somewhat in doubt which to follow, Dissipation's mask falls off, and immediately Melissa beholds such a "wan and ghastly countenance," that she turns away in horror, and gives her hand to the more sober of the two ladies.—Evenings at Home, xix (1795)

Herculês's Horse, Arion, given him by Adrastus. It had the gift of human speech, and its feet on the right side were those of a man.

Herculês's Pillars, Calpê and Ab'yla, one at Gibraltar and the other at Ceuta (hi tah). They were torn asunder by Alcids on his route to Gades (Cadiz).

Herculês (The Attic), Theseus (2 syl), who went about, like Herculês, destroying robbers, and performing most wonderful exploits

Herculês (The Cretan). All the three Idæan Dictæls were so called, viz., Celmis ("the smelter"), Daunamæneus ("the hammer"), and Acmon ("the anvil")

Herculês (The Egyptian), Sesostriæ (B.C. 1500). Another was Som or Chon, called by Pausanias, Macris son of Amon

Herculês (The English), Guy earl of Warwick (890-958)

Warwick thou English Herculês,
Dryden, Polydoron xiii. (1713).

Herculês (The Farnesê), a statue, the work of Glison, copied from one by Lysippus. Called Farnesê (3 syl) from its being placed in the Farnesê palace of Rome, where were at one time collected also the "Toro di Farnesê," the "Flora di Farnesê," and the "Gladiator di Farnesê." The "Herculês" and "Toro" are now at Naples. The "Farnesê Herculês" represents the hero exhausted by toil, leaning on his club, and in his left hand, which rests on his back, he holds one of the apples of the Hesperidês

* * A copy of this famous statue stands in the Tuilleries gardens of Paris

An excellent description of the statue is given by Thomson, in his Liberty, iv

Herman, a deaf and dumb boy, jailer of the dungeon of the Giant's Mount. Meeting Ulrica, he tries to seize her, when a flash of lightning strikes the bridge on which he stands, and Herman is thrown into the torrent—E Stirling, The Prisoner of State (1847)

Herman (Sir), of Goodalricke, one of the preceptors of the Knights Templars—Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

Hermann, the hero of Goethe's poem Hermann und Dorothea. Goethe tells us that the object of this poem is to "show, as in a mirror, the great movements and changes of the world's stage"

Hermaph'rodite (4 syl), son of Venus and Mercury. At the age of 15, he bathed in a fountain of Carr, when Sal'macis, the fountain nymph, fell in love with him, and prayed the gods to make the two one body. Her prayers being heard, the two became united into one, but still preserved the double sex.

Not that bright spring where fair Hermaphrodite Grew into one with wanton Sal'macis my dare compare with this.
Philip Fletcher The Purple Island v (1933)

Hermegild or Heimungyl'd, wife of the lord-constable of Northumberland. She was converted by Constance, but was murdered by a knight whose suit had been rejected by the young guest, in order to bring her into trouble. The villainy being discovered, the knight was executed, and Constance married the king, whose name was Alla. Hermegild, at the bidding of Constance, restored sight to a blind Briton—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("Man of Law's Tale," 1388)

(The word is spelt "Custaunce" 7 times, "Constance" 15 times, and "Constaunce" 17 times, in the tale.)

Hermegild, a friend of Oswald, in love with Gartha (Oswald's sister). He was a man in the middle age of life, of counsel sage, and great prudence. When Hubert (the brother of Oswald) and Gartha wished to stir up a civil war to avenge the death of Oswald, who had been slain in single combat with prince Gondibert, Hermegild wisely deterred them from the rash attempt, and diverted the anger of the camp by funeral obsequies of a most imposing character. The tale of Gondibert being unfinished, the sequel is not known—Sir W Davenant, Gondibert (died 1668)

Her'mês (2 syl), son of Maia, patron of commerce. Akenside makes Hermes say to the Thames, referring to the merchant ships of England

By you (ships) my function and my honoured name
Do I possess while o'er the Bætic vale,
Or thro' the towers of Memphis, or the palms
By sacred Canes watered, I conduct
The English merchant.

Akenside, Hymn to the Nalads (1767)

(The Bætic is the Guadalquivir, and the Bætic vale Granūda and Andaluena)

Her'mēs (2 syl), the same as Mercury, and applied both to the god and to the metal. Milton calls quicksilver "volatil Hermēs"

So when we see the liquid metal fall,
Which chemists by the name of Hermēs call.
Hooles's Ariosto vill.

Hermēs (St), same as St Elmo, Suerpo Santo, Castor and Pollux, etc. A comazant or electric light, seen occasionally on ships' masts

They shall see the fire which sailors call St Hermes fly upon their ships, and alight upon the toppe of the mast. — De Loler Treatise of Spectes 67 (1603)

Hermēs Trismegistus ("Hermēs thrice-greatest"), the Egyptian Thoth, to whom is ascribed a host of inventions as the art of writing in hieroglyphics, the first Egyptian code of laws, the art of harmony, the science of astrology, the invention of the lute and fire, magic, etc. (twentieth century n c)

The school of Hermēs Trismegistus,
Who uttered his oracles sublime
Before the Olympiads.

Longfellow The Golden Legend (1851)

Her'mesind (3 syl), daughter of Pelayo and Gaudiosa. She was plighted to Alphonso, son of lord Pedro of Cantabria. Both Alphonso and Hermesind at death were buried in the cave of St Antony, in Covadonga

Beauty and grace and innocence in her
In heavenly union shone. One who had held
The faith of elder Greece would sure have thought
She was some glorious nymph of æred divine Orend or Dryad. yea, she seemed Angel or soul beatified from realms
Of bliss to earth's rent.

Southey Roderick, etc. xvi. (1814)

Her'mia, daughter of Ugeus (3 syl) of Athens, and promised by him in marriage to Demetrius. As Hermia loved Lysander, and refused to marry Demetrius, her father summoned her before the duke, and requested that the "law of the land" might be carried out, which was death or perpetual virginity. The duke gave Hermia four days to consider the subject, at the expiration of which time she was either to obey her father or lose her life. She now fled from Athens with Lysander. Demetrius went in pursuit of her, and Helena, who doted on Demetrius, followed. All four came to a wood, and falling asleep from weariness, had a dream about the fairies. When Demetrius woke up, he came to his senses, and seeing that Hermia loved another, consented to marry Helena, and Egeus gladly gave the hand of his daughter to Lysander — Shakespeare, A Midsummer Night's Dream (1592)

Herm'ion, the young wife of Damon "the Pythagorean" and senator of Syracuse — J. Banim, Damon and Pythias (1825)

Herm'ionê (4 syl), only daughter of Menelaos and Helen. She became the wife of Pyrrhos or Neoptolimos, son of Achilles, but Orestes assassinated Pyrrhos and married Hermionê, who had been already betrothed to him

Herm'ionê (4 syl) or Harmônia, wife of Cadmus. Leaving Thebes, Cadmus and his wife went to Illyria, and were both changed into serpents for having killed a serpent sacred to Mars — Ovid, Metamorphoses, iv. 590, etc

Never since of a serpent kind
Love'd her not tho' that in Illyria [there] changed — Hermionê and Cadmus.

Milton Laradue l. 67 ix. 205 etc (1604)

Herm'ionê (1 syl), wife of Leontes, king of Sicily. The king, being jealous, sent her to prison, where she gave birth to a daughter, who, at the king's command, was to be placed on a desert shore and left to perish. The child was driven by a storm to the "coast" of Bohemia, and brought up by a shepherd who called her Perdita. Florizel, the son of Polixenes, king of Bohemia, fell in love with her, and they fled to Sicily to escape the vengeance of the angry king. Being introduced to Leontes, it was soon discovered that Perdita was his lost daughter, and Polixenes gladly consented to the union he had before objected to. Paulina (a lady about the court) now asked the royal party to her house to inspect a statue of Hermionê, which turned out to be the living queen herself. — Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale (1594)

Herm'ionê (4 syl), only daughter of Helen and Menelaos (4 syl) king of Sparta. She was betrothed to Orestes, but after the fall of Troy, was promised by her father in marriage to Pyrrhus, king of Lyrus. Orestes madly loved her, but Hermionê as madly loved Pyrrhus. When Pyrrhus fixed his affections on Andromache (widow of Hector, and his captive), the pride and jealousy of Hermionê were roused. At this crisis, an embassy led by Orestês arrived at the court of Pyrrhus, to demand the death of Asty'anax, the son of Andromachê and Hector, lest when he grew to manhood he might seek to avenge his father's death. Pyrrhus declined to give up the boy, and married Andromachê. The passion of Hermionê was now goaded to madness, and when she heard that the Greek ambassadors had fallen on Pyrrhus and murdered him, she stabbed herself and died—Ambrose Philips, The Distressed Mother (1712)

This was a famous part with Mrs Porter (*-1762), and with Miss Young better known as Mrs Pope (1740-1797)

Hermionê (4 syl), daughter of Danischmehend the Persian sorcerer, mentioned in Donnerhugel's narrative—Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Hermionê (The lady) or lady Ermin'ia Panletta, privately married to lord Dalgarno—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Hermit, the pseudonym of the poet Hayley, the friend of Cowper

Hermit (The English), Roger Crab, who subsisted on three farthings a week, his food being bran, herbs, roots, dock leaves, and mallows (*-1680)

Hermit (Peter the), the instigator of the first crusade (1050-1115)

Hermit and the Youth (The) A hermit, desirous to study the ways of Providence, met with a youth, who became his companion. The first night, they were most hospitably entertained by a nobleman, but at parting the young man stole his entertainer's golden goblet. Next day, they obtained with difficulty of a miser shelter from a severe storm, and at parting the youth gave him the golden goblet. Next night, they were modestly and freely welcomed by one of the middle class, and at parting the youth "crept to the cradle where an infant slept, and wrung its neck," it was the only child of their kind host. Leaving the hospitable roof, they lost their way, and were set right by a guide, whom the youth pushed into a river, and he was drowned. The hermit began to curse the youth, when lo! he turned into an angel, who thus explained his acts

I stole the goblet from the rich lord to teach him not to trust in uncertain riches. I gave the goblet to the miser to teach him that kindness always meets its reward. I strangled the infant because the man loved it better than he loved God. I pushed the guldo into the river because he intended at night full to commit a robbery. The hermit bent his head and cried. The ways of the Lord are past finding out! but He doeth all things well. Teach me to say with faith Thy will be done! —Parnell (1679-1717)

In the Talmud is a similar and better allegory. Rabbi Jaachanan accompanied Elijah on a journey, and they came to the house of a poor man, whose only treasure was a cow. The man and his wife ran to meet and welcome the strangers, but next morning the poor man's cow died. Next night, they were coldly received by a proud, rich man, who fed them only with bread and water, and next morning Elijah sent for a mason to repair a wall which was falling down, in return for the hospitality received. Next night, they entered a synagogue, and asked, "Who will give a night's lodging to two travellers?" but none offered to do so. At parting Elijah said, "I hope you will all be made presidents." The following night they were lodged by the members of another synagogue in the best hotel of the place, and at parting Elijah said, "May the Lord appoint over you but one president." The rabbi, unable to keep silence any longer, begged Elijah to explain the meaning of his dealings with men, and Elijah replied

In regard to the poor man who received us so hospitably it was decreed that his wife was to die that night, but in reward of his kindness, God took the cow instead of the wife. I repaired the wall of the rich miser because a chest of gold was concealed near the place, and if the miser had repaired the wall he would have discovered the treasure. I said to the inhospitable synagogue—May each member be president. I said to the man who had but one president, be no divisions of count. Lord, What does Thou not the Lord of all the earth do right? —The Talmud (Trust in God) See Gesta Romanorum lxx.

Hermite (Tristan P) or "Tristan of the Hospital," provost-marshal of France. He was the main instrument in carrying out the nefarious schemes of Louis XI, who used to call him his "gossip." Tristan was a stout, middle-sized man, with a hang-dog visage and most repulsive smile—Sir W Scott, Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Hero, daughter of Leonato governor of Messina. She was of a quiet, serious disposition, and formed a good contrast to the gay, witty rattle-pate, called Beatrice, her cousin. Hero was about to be married to lord Claudio, when don John played on her a most infamous practical joke out of malice. He bribed Hero's waiting-woman to dress in Hero's clothes, and to talk with him by moonlight from the chamber balcony, he then induced Claudio to hide himself in the garden, to overhear what was said. Claudio, thinking the person to be Hero, was furious, and next day at the altar rejected the bride with scorn. The priest, convinced of Hero's innocence, gave out that she was dead, the servant confessed the trick, don John took to flight, and Hero married Claudio her betrothed — Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing (1600)

Hero [Sutton], niece of sir William Sutton, and beloved by sir Valentine de Grey. Hero "was fair as no eye ever fairer saw, of noble stature, head of antique mould, magnificent as far as may consist with softness, features full of thought and moods, wishes and fancies, and limbs the paragon of symmetry." Having offended her lover by waltzing with lord Athuree, she assumed the garb of a quakeress, called herself "Ruth," and got introduced to sir Valentine, who proposed marriage to her, and then discovered that Hero was Ruth and Ruth was Hero — S Knowles, Woman's Wit, etc (1838)

Hero and Leander (3 syl.) Hero, a priestess of Venus, fell in love with Leander, who swam across the Hellespont every night to visit her. One night he was drowned in so doing, and Hero in grief threw herself into the same sea — Musæus, Leander and Hero

Hero of Fable (The), the duc de Guise. Called by the French L'Hero de la Fable (1614-1664)

Hero of History (The), the duc d'Enghien [Darn zjäh'n]. Called by the French L'Hero de l'Histoire. This was Le grand Conde (1621-1687)

Hero of Modern Italy, Garibaldi (1807-)

Herod'otos of Old London, J Stow (1525-1605)

Her'on (Sir George), of Chip-chace, an officer with sir John Foster — Sir W Scott, The Monastery (time, Elizabeth)

Heros'tratos or Erostratos, the Ephesian who set fire to the temple of Ephesus (one of the seven wonders of the world) merely to immortalize his name. The Ephesians made it penal even to mention his name.

Heros'tratos shall prove vice governs fame.
Who built that church he burnt with lost his name.
Lord Brooke Inquisition upon Farre (1554-16.5)

Herries (Lord), a friend of queen Mary of Scotland, and attending on her at Dundrennan — Sir W Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth)

Are neither fish nor flesh nor good red herring
Dryden Duke of Guise (1661)

Herring Pond (The), the ocean between the British Isles and America

What is your opinion pray on the institutions the other side of the Herring Pond? — Jennie of the Princess I.

Herschel (Sir F Wm) discovered the eighth planet, at first called the Georgium sidus, in honour of George III, and now called Uranus. In allusion to this, Campbell says he Gave the lyre of heaven another string

Pleasures of Hope I. (1799)

Herta, now called St Kilda, one of the Hebrides

Hertford (The margus of), in the court of Charles II — Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Her Trippa, meant for Henry Cornelius Agrippa of Nettesheim, philosopher and physician. "Her" is a contraction of Hericus, and "Trippa" a play on the words Agrippa and type — Rabelais, Pantagruel, iii 25 (1545)

Herwig, king of Hel'goland, betrothed to Gudrun, daughter of king Hettel (Attila). She was carried off by Hartmuth king of Norway, and as she refused to marry him, was put to the most menial work. Herwig conveyed an army into Norway, utterly defeated Hartmuth, liberated Gudrun, and married her — An Anglo-Saxon Poem (thirteenth century)

Her'zog (Duke), commander-in-chief of the ancient Teutons (Germans). The herzog was elected by the freemen of the tribe, but in times of war and danger, when several tribes united, the princes selected a leader, who was also called a "herzog," similar to the Gaulish "brennus" or "bren," and the Celtic "pendragon" or head chief.

Heskett (Ralph), landlord of the village ale-house where Robin Oig and Harry Wakefield fought.

Dame Heskett, Ralph's wife — Sir W Scott, The Two Drovers (time, George III)

Hesperia Italy was so called by the Greeks, because it was to them the

"Western Land" The Romans, for a similar reason, transferred the name to Spain

Hesper'idês (4 syl) The Hesperian Field The Hesperidês were the women who guarded the golden apples which Earth gave to Herê at her marriage with Zeus (Jove) They were assisted by the dragon Ladon The Hesperian Fields are the orchards in which the golden apples grew The island is one of the Cape Verd Isles, in the Atlantic

Wilt thou fly
With laughing Autumn to the Atlantic Isles,
And range with him th' Hesperian fields and see Where'er his fingers touch the fruitful grove
The branches shoot with gold?

Akenside Pleasures of Imagination 1 (1744)

Hesperus, the knight called by Tennyson "Evening Star," but called in the History of Prince Arthur, "the Green Knight" or sir Pertolope (3 syl) One of the four brothers who kept the passages of Castle Perilous—Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette"), sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 127 (1470)

* * It is a manifest blunder to call the Green Knight "Hesperus the Evening Star," and the Blue Knight the "Morning Star" The old romance makes the combat with the "Green Knight" at dawn, and with the "Blue Knight" at sunset The error has arisen from not bearing in mind that our forefathers began the day with the preceding eve, and ended it at sunset

Hettly (May), an old servant of David Deans—Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Heukbane (Mrs), the butcher's wife at Fairport, and a friend of Mrs Mailsetter—Sir W Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III)

Hew, son of lady Helen of "Merryland town" (Milan), enticed by an apple presented to him by a Jewish maiden, who then "stabbed him with a penknife, rolled the body in lead, and cast it into a well" Lady Helen went in search of her child, and its ghost cried out from the bottom of the well

The lead is wondrous heavy mither
The well is wondrous deep
A keen penknife sticks in my heart
A word I dounae speak

Percy Reliques 1.3.

Hick'ory (Old), general Andrew Jackson He was first called "Tough," then "Tough as Hickory," and, lastly, "Old Hickory" Another story is that in 1813, when engaged in war with the Creek Indians, he fell short of supplies and fed his men on hickory nuts (1767-1845)

* * This general Andrew Jackson must not be confounded with general Thomas Jackson, better known as "Stone-wall" Jackson (1826-1863)

Hierocles (4 syl), the first person who compiled jokes and bon mots. After a life-long labour he got together twenty-eight, which he left to the world as his legacy. Hence arose the phrase, An Hieroclean legacy, no legacy at all, a legacy of empty promises, or a legacy of no worth.

One of his anecdotes is that of a man who wanted to sell his house, and carried about a brick to show as a specimen of it.

He that tries to recommend Shakespeare by select quotations, will succeed like the pedant in Hierocles, who when he offered his house for sale, carried a brick in his pocket as a specimen.—Dr. Johnson Preface to Shakespeare

Hieronimo, the chief character of Thomas Kyd's drama in two parts, pt. 1 being called Hieronimo, and pt. 2 The Spanish Tragedy or Hieronimo is Mad Again. In the latter play, Horatio, only son of Hieronimo, sitting with Belimperia in an alcove, is murdered by his rival Balthazar and the lady's brother Lorenzo. The murderers hang the dead body on a tree in the garden, and Hieronimo, aroused by the screams of Belimperia, rushing into the garden, sees the dead body of his son, and goes raving mad (1588).

Higden (Mrs Betty), an old woman nearly four score, very poor, but hating the union-house more than she feared death. Betty Higden kept a mangle, and "minded young children" at fourpence a week. A poor workhouse lad named Sloppy helped her to turn the mangle. Mrs Boffin wished to adopt Johnny, Betty's infant grandchild, but he died in the Children's Hospital.

She was one of those old women, was Mrs. Betty Higden, who by dint of an indomitable purpose and a strong constitution, kept out many years an active old woman, with a bright dark eye and a resolute face yet quite a tender creature too.—C. Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, L. 15 (1874)

Higg, "the son of Snell," the lame witness at the trial of Rebecca.—Sir W. Scott, Franklin's time, Richard I.)

Higgen, Prigg, Snapp, and Fernet, Anavish beggars in The Beggars' Bush, a drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (1622).

High and Low Heels, two factions in Lilliput. So called from the high and low heels of their shoes, badges of the two factions. The High-heels (torises and the high-church party) were the most friendly to the ancient constitution of the empire, but the emperor employed the Low-heels (whigs and low-churchmen) as his ministers of state.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Lilliput," 1726)

High Life Below Stairs, a farce by the Rev James Townley. Mr Lovel, a wealthy commoner, suspects his servants of "wasting his substance in riotous living," so, pretending to go to his country seat in Devonshire, he assumes the character of a country bumpkin from Essex, and places himself under the charge of his own butler, to learn the duties of a gentleman's servant. As the master is away, Philip (the butler) invites a large party to supper, and supplies them with the choicest wines. The servants all assume their masters' titles, and address each other as "My lord duke," "sir Harry," "My lady Charlotte," "My lady Bab," etc., and mimic the airs of their employers. In the midst of the banquet, Lovel appears in his true character, breaks up the party, and dismisses his household, retaining only one of the lot, named Tom, to whom he entrusts the charge of the silver and plate (1759).

Highgate (a suburb of London) Drayton says that Highgate was so called because Brute, the mythical Trojan founder of the British empire, "appointed it for a gate of London," but others tell us that it was so called from a gate set up there, some 400 years ago, to receive tolls for the bishop of London.

Then Highgate boasts his way which men do most frequent.

Appointed for a gate of London to have been
When first the mighty Brute the city did begin.

Drayton, Po golden triall (1613)

Highland Mary, immortalized by Robert Burns, is generally thought to be Mary Campbell, but it seems more likely to be Mary Morison, "one of the poet's youthful loves." Probably the songs, Will ye go to the Indies, my Mary? Highland Mary, Mary Morison, and To Mary in Heaven, were all written on one and the same Mary, although some think Highland Mary and Mary in Heaven refer to Mary Campbell who, we are told, was the poet's first love.

Hobinol or Hobbinol is Gabriel Harvey, physician, LL D, a friend and college chum of Edmund Spenser the poet Spenser, in his eel iv, makes Thenot inquire, "What gars thee to weep?" and Hobinol replies it is because his friend Colin, having been flouted by Rosalind (eel i), has broken his pipe and seems heart-broken with grief Thenot then begs Hobinol to sing to him one of Colin's own songs, and Hobinol sings the lay of "Elisa queen of the shepherds" (queen Elizabeth), daughter of Syrinx and Pan (Anne Boleyn and Henry VIII) He says Phæbus thrust out his golden head to gaze on her, and was amazed to see a sun on earth brighter and more dazzling than his own The Graeces requested she might make a fourth grace, and she was received amongst them and reigned with them in heaven
The shepherds then strewed flowers to the queen, and Elisa dismissed them, saying that at the proper season she would reward them with ripe damsons (eel iv)
Eel ix is a dialogue between Hobinol and Diggon Davie, upon Popish abuses (See DIGGON DAVIE) — Spenser, *Shepherd's
Calendar* (1572)

Hobnel'ia, a shepherdess, in love with

Hob'son (Tobias), a carrier who lived at Cambridge in the seventeenth century. He kept a livery stable, but obliged the university students to take his hacks in rotation. Hence the term Hobson's choice came to signify "this or none." Milton (in 1660) wrote two humorous poems on the death of the old carrier.

Hochspringen (The young duke of), introduced in Donnerhugel's narrative—Sir W. Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.)

Hocus (Humphry), "the attorney" into whose hands John Bull and his friends put the law-suit they carried on against Lewis Baboon (Louis XIV). Of course, Humphry Hocus is John Churchill, duke of Marlborough, who commanded the army employed against the Grand Monarque.

Hocus was an old cunning a turney and though this was the first considerable suit he was ever engaged in he showed himself superior in address to most of his profession. He always kept good clerks. He loved money was smooth tongued gave good words and seldom lost his temper. He provided plentifully for his family but he loved him better than them all. The neighbours reported that he was hen pecked which was impossible by such a mild-spirited woman as his wife was (his wife was a desperate termagant)—Dr Arbuthnot, History of John Bull, v (1712).

Holopher'nes (4 syl), a pedantic schoolmaster, who speaks like a dictionary. The character is meant for John Florio, a teacher of Italian in London, who published, in 1598, a dictionary called A World of Words. He provoked the retort by condemning wholesale the English dramas, which, he said, were "neither right comedies, nor right tragedies, but perverted histories without decorum." The following sentence is a specimen of the style in which he talked

The deer was In sanguis (blood) ripe as a pome-water who now hangeth like a Jewel in the ear of celo (the sky the welkin the heaven), and anon falleth like a crab on the face of terra (the soil the land the earth)—Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost act iv. sc. 2 (1594)

* * Holophernes is an imperfect anagram of "Johnes Florio," the first and last letters being omitted

Holy Bottle (The Oracle of the), the object of Pantagruel's search. He visited various lands with his friend Panurge (2 syl), the last place being the island of Lantern-land, where the "bottle" was kept in an alabaster fount in a magnificent temple. When the party arrived at the sacred spot, the priestess threw something into the fount, whereupon the water began to bubble, and the word "Drink" issued from the "bottle." So the whole party set to drinking Falernian wine, and, being inspired with drunkenness, raved with prophetic madness, and so the romance ends—Rabelais, Pantagruel (1515)

Like Pantagruel and his companions in quest of the Oracle of the Bottle.—Sterne.

Holy Brotherhood (The), in Spain called Santa Hermandad, was an association for the suppression of highway robbers trothed to Dick Dowlas (for a short time the Hon Dick Dowlas) When Cicely went to London with her brother, she took a situation with Caroline Dormer Miss Dormer married "the heir-at-law" of baron Duberly, and Cicely married Dick Dowlas —G Colman, The Heir-at-Law (1797)

Hominy (Mrs), philosopher and authoress, wife of major Hominy, and "mother of the modern Græchi," as she called her daughter, who lived at New Thermopylae, three days this side of "Eden," in America Mrs Hominy was considered by her countrymen a "very choice spirit" —C Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1844)

Homo, man Said to be a corruption of OMO, the two O's represent the two eyes, and the M the rest of the human face Dant  says the gaunt face of a starved man resembles the letter "m"

Who reads the name
For man upon his forehead there the M
Had traced most plainly
Dant  Purgatory xxiil (1808)

* * The two downstrokes represent the contour, and the V of the letter represents the nose. Hence the human face is 1°V°!

Honest George General George Monk, duke of Albemarle, was so called by the Cromwellites (1608-1670)

Honest Man Diogen s, being asked one day what he was searching for so diligently that he needed the light of a lantern in broad day, replied, "An honest man"

Searched with lantern light to find an honest man
Southey Roderick etc. xii (1814)

Still will he hold his lantern up to scan
The face of monarchs for an honest man
Byron Age of Bronze x. (1821)

Honest Thieves (The) The "thieves" are Ruth and Arabella, two heiresses, brought up by justice Day, trustees of the estates of Ruth and guardian of Arabella The two girls wish to marry colonel Careless and captain Manly, but do not know how to get possession of their property, which is in the hands of justice Day It so happens that Day goes to pay a visit, and the two girls, finding the key of his strong box, help themselves to the deeds, etc., to which they are respectively entitled Mrs Day, on her return, accuses them of robbery, but Manly says, "Madam, they have taken nothing but what is their own They are honest thieves, I assure you" —T Knight (a farce)

* * This is a mere ris famento of The Committee (1670), by the Hon sir R Howard Most of the names are identical, but "captain Manly" is substituted for colonel Blunt

Honesty Timour used to boast that during his reign a child might carry a purse of gold from furthest east to furthest west of his vast empire without fear of being robbed or molested —Gibbon, Decline and Fall, etc (1776-88)

A similar state of things existed in Ireland, brought about by the administration of king Brien A young lady of great beauty, adorned with jewels, undertook a journey alone from one end of the kingdom to the other, but no attempt was made upon her honour, nor was she robbed of her jewels —Warner, History of Ireland, 1 10

* * Thomas Moore has made this the subject of one of his Irish Melodies, 1 ("Rich and Rare were the Gems she Wore," 1814)

Honey Glaucus, son of Minos, was smothered in a cask of honey

Honeycomb (Will), a fine gentleman, the great authority on the fashions of the day He was one of the members of the imaginary club from which the Spectator issued —The Spectator (1711-1713)

Honeycombe (Mr), the uxorious husband of Mrs Honeycombe, and father of Polly Self-willed, passionate, and tyrannical He thinks to bully Polly out of her love-nonsense, and by locking her in her chamber to keep her safe, forgetting that "love laughs at locksmiths," and "where there's a will there's a way"

Mrs Honeycombe, the dram-drinking, maudling, foolish wife of Mr Honeycombe, always ogling him, calling him "lovey," "sweeting," or "dearie," but generally muzzy, and obfuscated with cordials or other messes

Polly Honeycombe, the daughter of Mr and Mrs Honeycombe, educated by novels, and as full of romance as don Quixote Mr Ledger, a stock-broker, pays his addresses to her, but she hates him, and determines to clope with Mr Scribble, an attorney's clerk, and nephew of her nurse This folly, however, is happily interrupted — G Colman the elder, Polly Honeycombe (1760)

Honeyman (Charles), a free-and-easy clergyman, of social habits and fluent speech — Thackeray, The Newcomes (1855)

Honeymoon (The), a comedy by J Tobin (1804) The general scheme resembles that of the Taming of the Shrew, viz, breaking-in an unruly colt of high mettle to the harness of wifely life The duke of Aranza marries the proud, overbearing, but beautiful Julianna, eldest daughter of Balthazar After marriage, he takes her to a mean hut, and pretends he is only a peasant, who must work for his daily bread, and that his wife must do the household drudgery He acts with great gentleness and affection, and by the end of the month, Julianna, being thoroughly reformed, is introduced to the castle, where she finds that her husband after all is the duke, and that she is the duchess of Aranza It is an excellent and well-written comedy

Honeywood, "the good-natured man," whose property is made the prey of swindlers His uncle, sir William Honeywood, in order to rescue him from sharpers, causes him to be seized for a bill to which he has lent his name "to a friend who absconded" By this arrest the young man is taught to discriminate between real friends and designing knaves Honeywood dotes on Miss Richland, but fancies she loves Mr Lofly, and therefore forbears to avow his love, eventually, however, all comes right Honeywood promises to "reserve his pity for real distress, and his friendship for true merit"

Though inclined to the right [he] had not courage to condemn the wrong. [His] charity was but injustice [his] benevolence but weakness and [his] friendship but credulity — Act v

Sir William Honeywood, uncle of Mr Honeywood "the good-natured man" Sir William sees with regret the faults of his nephew, and tries to correct them He is a dignified and high-minded gentleman — Goldsmith, The Good-natured Man (1767)

Hono'ia, daughter of general Arehas "the loyal subject" of the great-duke of Moscovia, and sister of Viola — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Loyal Subject (1618)

Hono'ria, a fair but haughty dame, greatly loved by Theodoro of Ravenna, but the lady "hated him alone," and "the more he loved the more she disdained" One day, she saw the ghost of Guido Cavalcanti hunting with two mastiffs a damsel who despised his love and who was doomed to suffer a year for every month she had tormented him Her torture was to be hunted by dogs, torn to pieces, disembowelled, and restored to life again every Friday This vision so acted on the mind of Honoria, that she no longer resisted the love of Theodoro, but, "with the full consent of all, she changed her state" — Dryden, Theodoro and Honoria (a poem)

* * This tale is from Boecetio, Decameron (day v 8)

Honour (Mrs), the waiting gentlewoman of Sophia Western — Fielding, Tom Jones (1749)

This is worse than Sophy Western and Mrs. Honour about Tom Jones's broken arm — Prof. J Wilson

Honour of the Spear, a tournament

He came to Runa schooling halls, and fought the honour of the spear — Oxián The War of Imit Thona.

Honours (Crushed by His or Her)

Tarpeia (3 syl), daughter of Tarpeius (governor of the citadel of Rome), promised to open the gates to Tatiüs, if his soldiers would give her the ornaments they wore on their arms As the soldiers entered the gate, they threw on her their shields, and crushed her to death, saying, "These are the ornaments we Sabines wear on our arms"

Draco, the Athenian legislator, was crushed to death in the theatre of Ægina by the number of caps and cloaks showered on him by the audience, as a mark of honour

Elagabalus, the Roman emperor, invited the leading men of Rome to a banquet, and, under pretence of showing them honour, rained roses upon them till they were smothered to death

Hood (Robin), a famous English outlaw Slow places him in the reign of Richard I, but others make him live at divers periods between Cœur de Lion and Edward II His chief haunt was Sherwood Forest, in Nottinghamshire Ancient ballads abound with anecdotes of his personal courage, his skill in archery, his generosity, and great popularity. It is said that he robbed the rich, but gave largely to the poor, and protected women and children with chivalrous magnanimity. According to tradition, he was treacherously bled to death by a nun, at the command of his kinsman, the prior of Kirkless, in Notts.

Stukeley asserts that Robin Hood was Robert Fitzooth, earl of Huntingdon, and it is probable that his name hood, like capet given to the French king Hugues, refers to the cape or hood which he usually wore.

* * The chief incidents of his life are recorded by Stow. Ritson has collected a volume of songs, ballads, and anecdotes called Robin Hood that Celebrated English Outlaw (1795). Sir W. Scott has introduced him in his novel called Ivanhoe, which makes the outlaw contemporary with Cœur de Lion.

Robin Hood's Men. The most noted of his followers were Little John, whose surname was Nailor, his chaplain friar Tuck, William Searlet, Senthelooke (2 syl), or Scadlock, sometimes called two brothers, Will Stutly or Stukely, Mutch the miller's son, and the maid Marian.

Hope. The name of the first woman, according to Grecian mythology, was Pandora, made by Hephestos (Vulcan) out of earth. She was called Pandora ("all-gifted") because all the deities contributed something to her charms. She married Epimetheus (4 syl), in whose house was a box which no mortal might open. Curiosity induced Pandora to peep into it, when out flew all the ills of humanity, and she had just time to close the lid to prevent the escape of Hope a'so.

Hope the Motive Power of All.

The ambitious prince doth hope to conquer all
The dukes, earls, lords, and knights hope to be kings;
The prelates hope to push for popish pall
The lawyers hope to purchase wondrous things
The merchants hope for no less reckonings
The peasant hopes to get a ferme [farm] at least
All men are guests where Hope doth hold the feast.

Hope Diamond (The), a blue brilliant, weighing 44½ carats.

It is supposed that this diamond is the same as the blue diamond bought by Louis XIV in 1668, of Tavernier. It weighed in the rough 112½ carats, and after being cut 67½ carats. In 1792 it was lost. In 1830, Mr Daniel Eliason came into possession of a blue diamond without any antecedent history, this was bought by Mr Henry Thomas Hope, and is called "The Hope Diamond."

Hop-o'-my-Thumb, a character in several nursery tales. Tom Thumb and Hop-o'-my-thumb are not the same, although they are often confounded with each other. Tom Thumb was the son of peasants, knighted by King Arthur, and was killed by a spider, but Hop-o'-my-thumb was a nix, the same as the German dumpling, the French le petit pource, and the Scotch Tom-a-lin or Tamlane. He was not a human dwarf, but a fay of usual fairy proportions.

Horace, son of Oronte (2 syl) and lover of Agnes. He first sees Agnes in a balcony, and takes off his hat in passing. Agnes returns his salute, "pour ne point manquer a la civilite." He again takes off his hat, and she again returns the compliment. He bows a third time, and she returns his "politeness" a third time. "Il passe, vient, repasse, et toujours me fait a chaque fois reverence, et moi nouvelle reverence aussi je lui rendois." An intimacy is soon established, which ripens into love. Oronte tells his son he intends him to marry the daughter of Enrique (2 syl), which he refuses to do, but it turns out that Agnes is in fact Enrique's daughter, so that love and obedience are easily reconciled.—Moliere, L'Ecole des Femmes (1662)

Horace de Brienne (2 syl), engaged to Diana de Lascours, but after the discovery of Ogarita [alias Martha, Diana's sister], he falls in love with her, and marries her with the free consent of his former choice.—E. Stirling, The Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1806)

Horatia, daughter of Horatius "the Roman father." She was engaged to Caius Curatius, whom her surviving brother slew in the well-known combat of the three Romans and three Albans. For the purpose of being killed, she insulted her brother Publius in his triumph, and spoke disdainfully of his "patriotic love," which he preferred to filial and brotherly affection. In his anger he stabbed his sister with his sword.—Whitehead, The Roman Father (1741)

Horatio, the intimate friend of prince Hamlet—Shakespeare, Hamlet Prince of Denmark (1596)

Horatio, the friend and brother-in-law of lord Altamont, who discovers by accident that Calista, lord Altamont's bride, has been seduced by Lothario, and informs lord Altamont of it. A duel ensues between the bridegroom and the libertine, in which Lothario is killed, and Calista stabs herself.—N. Rowe, The Fair Penitent (1703)

Horatius, "the Roman father." He is the father of the three Horatii chosen by the Roman senate to espouse the cause of Rome against the Albans. He glories in the choice, preferring his country to his offspring. His daughter, Horatia, was espoused to one of the Curatii, and was slain by her surviving brother for taunting him with murder under the name of patriotism. The old man now renounced his son, and would have given him up to justice, but king and people interposed in his behalf.

Publius Horatius, the surviving son of "the Roman father." He pretended flight, and as the Curatii pursued, "but not with equal speed," he slew them one by one as they came up.—Whitehead, The Roman Father (1741)

Horatius [Cocles], captain of the bridge-gate over the Tiber. When Porsenna brought his host to replace Tarquin on the throne, the march on the city was so sudden and rapid, that the consul said, "The foe will be upon us before we can cut down the bridge." Horatius exclaimed, "If two men will join me, I will undertake to give the enemy play till the bridge is cut down." Spurius Larinus and Herminius volunteered to join him in this bold enterprise. Three men came against them and were cut down. Three others met the same fate. Then the lord of Luna came with his band "which none but he could yield," but the Tuscan was also despatched. Horatius then ordered his two companions to make good their escape, and they just crossed the bridge as it fell in with a crash. The bridge being down, Horatius threw himself into the Tiber and swam safe to shore, amidst the applauding shouts of both armies—Lord Macaulay, Lays of Ancient Rome ("Horatius," 1842)

Horn (The Cape) So named by Schouten, a Dutch mariner, who first rounded it. He was born at Hoorn, in North Holland, and named the cape after his own native town.

Horn (King), hero of a French metrical romance, the original of our Childe Horne or The Geste of Kyng Horn. The French romance is ascribed to Mestre Thomas, and Dr Percy thinks the English romance is of the twelfth century, but this is probably at least a century too early.

Horn of Chastity and Fidelity

Morgan la Faye sent King Arthur a drinking-horn, from which no lady could drink who was not true to her husband, and no knight who was not feal to his liege lord. Sir Lamorake sent this horn as a taunt to Sir Mark, king of Cornwall—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, ii. 34 (1470).

Aristo's enchanted cup

The cuckold's drinking-horn, from which no "cuckold could drink without spilling the liquor" (See CARADOC, p. 160).

La coupe enchanlée of Lafontaine (See CHASTITY.)

Horne, in the proverb I'll chance it, as old Horne did his neck, refers to Horne, a clergyman in Nottinghamshire, who committed murder, but escaped to the Continent. After several years, he determined to return to England, and when told of the danger of so doing, replied, "I'll chance it." He did chance it, but being apprehended, was tried, condemned, and executed—The Newgate Calendar.

Horner (Jack), the little boy who sat in a corner to eat his Christmas pie, and put himself wondrously clever because he contrived to pull out a plum with his thumb.

Little Jack Horner sat in a corner

Eating his Christmas pie

He put in his thumb and pulled out a plum

Saying 'What a good boy am I!'

Humorous Rhyme.

In Notes and Queries, vi. 156, several explanations are offered, ascribing a political meaning to the words quoted—Jack Horner being elevated to a king's messenger or king's steward, and the "plum" pulled out so cleverly being a valuable deed which the messenger abstracted.

Horse The first to ride and tame a horse for the use of man was Melizus, king of Thessaly (See MELIZUS.)

Horse (The Black), the 7th Dragoon Guards (not the 7th Dragoons). They have black velvet facings, and their plume is black and white. At one time they rode black horses.

Horse (The Green), the 5th Dragoon Guards (These are called "The Princess Charlotte of Wales") Facings dark green velvet, but the plume is red and white.

Horse (The White), the 3rd Dragoon Guards (These are called "The Prince of Wales")

 All the Dragoon Guards have velvet facings, except the 6th (or "Carabiniers"), which have white cloth facings. By "facings" are meant the collar and cuffs.

N.B.—"The white horse within the Garter" is not the heraldic insignia of the White Horse Regiment or 3rd Dragoon Guards, but of the 3rd Hussars (or "The King's Own"), who have also a white plume. This regiment used to be called "The 3rd Light Dragoons."

Horse (The Royal), the Blues.

Horse (The Wooden), a huge horse constructed by Ulysses and Diomed, for secreting soldiers. The Trojans were told by Sinon it was an offering made by the Greeks to the sea-god, to ensure a safe home-voyage, adding that the blessing would pass from the Greeks to the Trojans if the horse were placed within the city walls. The credulous Trojans drew the monster into the city, but at night Sinon released the soldiers from the horse and opened the gates to the Greek army. The sentinels were slain, the city fired in several places, and the inhabitants put to the sword. The tale of the "Wooden Horse" forms no part of Homer's Iliad, but is told by Virgil in his Æneid. Virgil borrowed the tale from Arctinos of Miletus, one of the Cyclic poets, who related the story of the "Wooden Horse" and the "burning of Troy."

* * A very similar stratagem was employed in the seventh century A.D. by Abu Obeidah in the siege of Arrestan, in Syria. He obtained leave of the governor to deposit in the citadel some old lumber which impeded his march. Twenty boxes (filled with soldiers) were accordingly placed there, and Abu, like the Greeks, pretended to march homewards. At night the soldiers removed the sliding bottoms of the boxes, killed the sentries, opened the city gates, and took the town — Oakley, History of the Saracens, i. 185.

The capture of Sark was effected by a similar trick. A gentleman of the Netherlands, with one ship, asked permission of the French to bury one of his crew in the chapel. The request was granted, but the coffin was full of arms. The pretended mourners, being well provided with arms, fell on the guards and took the island by surprise — Percy, Anecdotes, 249.

Horse (Merlin's Wooden), Clavileno. This was the horse on which don Quixote effected the disenchantment of the infanta Antonomiasa and others. (See CLAVILENO, p. 194.)

Horse (The Enchanted), a wooden horse with two pegs. By turning one the horse rose into the air, and by turning the other it descended where and when the rider listed. It was given by an Indian to the shah of Persia, as a New Year's gift. (See FIKOUZ SHAH) — Arabian Nights ("The Enchanted Horse").

Horse (The fifteen points of a good)

A good horse should have three propertees of a man: three of a woman, three of a fox, three of a hare and three of an ass. Of a man, bolde prowde and hardye. Of a woman, fayre-breasted, faire of here and easy to move. Of a foxe, a fair taylle short eers, with a good trotte. Of a hare, a grale eye, a dry head and well rennyngs. Of an ass, a byrre clynn, a flat legges and a good hoof — Wynkyn de Worde (1495).

Horse-hair breeds Animals
According to legend, if the hair of a horse is dropped into corrupted water, it will turn to an animal.

A horse hair laid in a pale full of turbid water will in a short time stir and become a living creature — Hollinshed De Crition of Eng and 224.

Horse Neighing On the death of Smerdis, the several competitors for the Persian crown agreed that he whose horse neighed first should be appointed king. The horse of Darius neighed first, and Darius was made king. Lord Brooke calls him a Scythian, he was son of Hystaspes the satrap.

Velasquez painted a Spanish admiral so true to life that Felipe IV., mistaking it for the man, reproved the supposed officer sharply for wasting his time in a painter's studio, when he ought to be with his fleet.

Zeuxis painted some grapes so admirably that birds flew at them, thinking them real fruit.

Parrhasios of Ephesus painted a curtain so imitatively that Zenæus thought it to be a real curtain, and bade the artist draw it aside that he might see the painting behind.

Quentin Matsys of Antwerp painted a bee on the outstretched leg of a fallen angel so naturally that when old Mandyn, the artist, returned to his studio, he tried to frighten it away with his pocket-handkerchief.

Horse of Brass (The), a present from the king of Araby and Ind to Cambuscan' king of Tartary. A person whispered in its ear where he wished to go, and having mounted, turned a pin, whereupon the brazen steed rose in the air as high as the rider wished, and within twenty-four hours landed him at the end of his journey.

This is that Hamlet who lived at the court of Horwendillus, 500 years before we were born—Hazlitt.

Hosier's Ghost (Admiral), a ballad by Richard Glover (1789) Admiral Hosier was sent with twenty sail to the Spanish West Indies, to block up the galleons of that country. He arrived at the Bastimentos, near Portobello, but had strict orders not to attack the foe. His men perished by disease but not in fight, and the admiral himself died of a broken heart. After Vernon's victory, Hosier and his 8000 men rose, "all in dreary hammocks shrouded, which for winding-sheets they wore," and lamented the cruel orders that forbade them to attack the foe, for "with twenty ships he surely could have achieved what Vernon did with only six" (See GREENILLI)

William Denby [1738-1817] had the true poetic enthusiasm. None that I remember possessed even a portion of that fine madness which he threw out in Hotspur's fine rant about glory. His voice had the dissonance and at times the inspiring effect of the trumpet.—G. Lamb

Houd (1 syl), a prophet sent to preach repentance to the Adites (2 syl), and to reprove their king Shedad for his pride. As the Adites and their king refused to hear the prophet, God sent on the kingdom first a drought of three years' duration, and then the Sarsar or icy wind for seven days, so that all the people perished. Houd is written "Hûd" in Sale's Ārār, 1

Then stood the prophet Houd and cried

Woe! woe to Irem! woe to Ad!

Death is gone up into her palaces!

Woe! woe a day of guilt and punishment!

House of Fame, a magnificent palace erected on a lofty mountain of ice, and supported by rows of pillars on which are inscribed the names of illustrious poets. Here the goddess of fame sits on a throne, and dispenses her capricious judgments to the crowd below who come to seek her favours—Chaucer, House of Fame

House that Jack Built (The), a cumulative nursery story, in which every preceding statement is repeated after the introduction of a new one, thus

- 1 [This is] the house that Jack built.
- 2 [This is] the malt that lay in
- 3 [This is] the rat that eat
- 4 [This is] the cat that killed
- 5 [This is] the dog that worried
- 6 [This is] the cow with the crumpled horn that tossed
- 7 [This is] the
- 8 [This is] the
- 9 [This is] the

A similar accumulation occurs in another nursery tale, with this difference—the several clauses are repeated twice once by entreaty of the old woman to perform some service to get her pig to cross over a bridge that she may get home, and then the reverse way, when each begins the task requested of them. It begins with a statement that an old woman went to market to buy a pig, they came to a bridge, which the pig would not go over, so the old woman called to a stick, and said

- 1 [Stick, stick beat pig for] pig won't go over the bridge and I shan't get home to night.
- 2 [Fire fire] burn stick stick won't heat 1, 1,

3. [Water, water] quench fire fire won't
 4. [Ox, ox] drink water water won't
 5. [Butcher butcher] kill ox ox won't
 6. [Rope rope] hang butcher butcher won't
 7. [Cat rat] gnaw rope, rope won't
 8. Cat, cat kill rat rat won't

Then the cat began to kill the rat and the rat began to gnaw the rope and the rope began etc., and the pig went over the bridge and so the old woman got home that night.

Hubba and Ingwar, two Danish chiefs, who, in 870, conquered East Anglia and wintered at Thetford, in Norfolk. King Edmund fought against them, but was beaten and taken prisoner. The Danish chiefs offered him his life and kingdom if he would renounce Christianity and pay them tribute, but as he refused to do so, they tied him to a tree, shot at him with arrows, and then cut off his head. Edmund was therefore called "St Edmund." Alured fought seven battles with Hubba, and slew him at Abingdon, in Berkshire.

Hubberd (Mother) Mother Hubbard's Tale, by Edmund Spenser, is a satirical fable in the style of Chaucer, supposed to be told by an old woman (Mother Hubbard) to relieve the weariness of the poet during a time of sickness. The tale is this: An ape and a fox went into partnership to seek their fortunes. They resolved to begin their adventures as beggars, so Master Ape dressed himself as a broken soldier, and Reynard pretended to be his dog. After a time they came to a farmer, who employed the ape as shepherd, but when the rascals had so reduced the flock that detection was certain, they decamped. Next they tried the Church, under advice of a priest, Reynard was appointed rector to a living, and the ape was his parish clerk. From this living they were obliged also to remove. Next they went to court as foreign potentates, and drove a splendid business, but came to grief ere long. Lastly, they saw king Lion asleep, his skin was lying beside him, with his crown and sceptre. Master Ape stole the regalia, dressed himself as king Lion, usurped the royal palace, made Reynard his chief minister, and collected round him a band of monsters, chiefly amphibious, as his guard and court. In time, Jupiter sent Mercury to rouse king Lion from his lethargy, so he awoke from sleep, broke into his palace, and bit off the ape's tail, with a part of its ear.

Since which all apes but half their ears have left
And of their tails are utterly bereft.

As for Reynard, he ran away at the first alarm, and tried to curry favour with king Lion, but the king only exposed him and let him go (1591).

Hubbard (Old Mother) went to her cupboard to get a bone for her dog, but, not finding one, trotted hither and thither to fetch sundry articles for his behoof. Every time she returned she found Master Doggie performing some extraordinary feat, and at last, having finished all her errands, she made a grand curtsy to Master Doggie. The dog, not to be outdone in politeness, made his mistress a profound bow, upon which the dams said, "Your servant!" and the dog replied, "Bow, now!" — Nursery Tale

Sir Hudibras is a presbyterian justice in the Commonwealth, who sets out with his squire Ralph (an independent) to reform abuses, and enforce the observance of the laws for the suppression of popular sports and amusements (1663, 1664, 1678)

* * * The Grub Street Journal (1731) maintains that the academy figure of Hudibras was colonel Rolle of Devonshire, with whom the poet lodged for some time, and adds that the name is derived from Hugh de Bras, the patron saint of the county. Others say that sir Samuel Luke was the original, and cite the following distich in proof thereof—

"His name, there's a valiant Mameche
In foreign lands yeaped" • • [Sir Luke]

Hudjadge, a shah of Persia, suffered much from sleeplessness, and commanded Itead, his porter and gardener, to tell him tales to while away the weary hours. Itead declared himself wholly unable to comply with this request. "Then find some one who can," said Hudjadge, "or suffer death for disobedience." On reaching home, greatly dejected, he told his only daughter, Moradbak, who was motherless, and only 14 years old, the shah's command, and she undertook the task. She told the shah the stories called The Oriental Tales, which not only amused him, but cured him, and he married her—Comte de Caylus, Oriental Tales (1743)

Hudson (Sir Geoffrey), the famous dwarf, formerly page to queen Henrietta Maria. Sir Geoffrey tells Julian Peveril how the late queen had him enclosed in a pie and brought to table—Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

* * * Vandike has immortalized sir Geoffrey by his brush, and some of his clothes are said to be preserved in sir Hans Sloane's museum

Hudson (Tam), gamekeeper—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Hugh, blacksmith at Ringleburn, a friend of Hobbie Elliott, the Heughfoot farmer—Sir W Scott, The Black Dwarf (time, Anne)

Hugh, servant at the Maypole inn. This giant in stature and ringleader in the "No Popery riots," was a natural son of sir John Chester and a gipsy. He loved Dolly Varden, and was very kind to Barnaby Rudge the half-witted lad. Hugh was executed for his participation in the "Gordon riots"—C Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841)

Hugh count of Vermandois, a crusader—Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Hugh de Brass (Mr), in A Regular Fix, by J M Morton

Hugh of Lincoln, a boy eight years old, said to have been stolen, tortured, and crucified by Jews in 1255. Eighteen of the wealthiest Jews of Lincoln were hanged for taking part in this affair, and the boy was buried in state

* * * There are several documents in Rymer's Fœdera relative to this event. The story is told in the Chronicles of Matthew Paris. It is the subject of the Priores's Tale in Chaucer, and Wordsworth has a modernized version of Chaucer's tale

A similar story is told of William of Norwich, said to have been crucified by the Jews in 1137

Percy, in his Reliques, i 3, has a ballad about a boy named Hew, whose mother was "lady Hew of Merryland" (? England). He was enticed by an apple given him by a Jewish damsel, who "stabbed him with a penknife, rolled him in lead, and cast him into a well"

Werner is another boy said to have been crucified by the Jews. The place of this alleged murder was Brunaracn

Hugo, count of Vermandois, brother of Philippe I of France, and leader of the Franks in the first crusade Hugo died before Godfrey was appointed general-in-chief of the allied armies (bk i), but his spirit appeared to Godfrey when the army went against the Holy City (bk xviii) —Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

Hugo, brother of Arnold, very small of stature, but brave as a lion. He was slain in the faction fight stirred up by prince Oswald against duke Godibert, his rival in the love of Rhodabind daughter and only child of Aribert king of Lombardy

Of stature small but was all over heart,
And the unhappy all that heart was love.
Sir W. Davensant, Godibert l. 1 (died 1668)

Hugo, natural son of Azo chief of the house of Este (2 syl) and Bianca, who died of a broken heart, because, although a mother, she was never wed. Hugo was betrothed to Parisina, but his father, not knowing it, made Parisina his own bride. One night Azo heard Parisina in her sleep confess her love for Hugo, and the angry marquis ordered his son to be beheaded. What became of Parisina "none knew, and none can ever know" —Byron, Parisina (1816)

Hugo Hugonet, minstrel of the earl of Douglas —Sir W. Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I)

Hugon (King), the great nursery-ogre of France

Huguenot Pope (The) Philippe de Mornay, the great supporter of the French huguenots, is called Le Pape des Huguenots (1549-1623)

* * Of course, Philippe de Mornay was not one of the "popes of Rome"

Huguenots (Les), an opera by Meyerbeer (1836). The subject of this opera is the massacre of the French huguenots or protestants, planned by Catherine de Medici on St Bartholomew's Day (August 24, 1572), during the wedding festivities of her daughter Margherita (Marguerite) and Henri le Beauvais (afterwards Henri IV of France)

Hul'sean Lectures, certain sermons preached at Great St. Mary's Church, Cambridge, and paid for by a gift of the Rev John Hulse, of Heshire, in 1777

Till the year 1860, the Hul'sean

Humphrey (Master), the hypothetical compiler of the tale entitled "Barnaby Rudge" in Master Humphrey's Clock, by Charles Dickens (1840)

Humphrey (Old), pseudonym of George Mogridge

* * George Mogridge has also issued several books under the popular name of "Peter Parley," which was first assumed by S. G. Goodrich, in 1828. Several publishers of high standing have condescended to palm books on the public under this nom de plume, some written by William Martin, and others by names warily unknown

Humphrey (The good duke), Humphrey Plantagenet, duke of Gloucester, youngest son of Henry IV, murdered in 1446

Humphrey (To dine with duke), to go without dinner To stay behind in St Paul's aisle, under pretence of finding out the monument of duke Humphrey, while others more fortunate go home to dinner

* * * It was really the monument of John Beauchamp that the "dinnerless" hung about, and not that of duke Humphrey John Beauchamp died in 1359, and duke Humphrey in 1446

A similar phrase is, "To be the guest of the cross-legged knights," meaning the stone effigies in the Round Church (London) Lawyers at one time made this church the rendezvous of their clients, and here a host of dinnerless vagabonds used to loiter about, in the hope of picking up a job which would furnish them with the means of getting a dinner

"To dine or sup with sir Thomas Gresham" means the same thing, the Royal Exchange being at one time the great lounge of idlers

The little coin thy purseless pockets line,
Yet with great company thou art taken up
For often with duke Humphrey thou dost dine,
And often with sir Thomas Gresham sup
Hayman, Quidnunc (epigram on a loafer 1625)

Huncamunca (Princess), daughter of King Arthur and queen Dollalolla, beloved by lord Grizzle and Tom Thumb The king promises her in marriage to the "pugnacious queller" Huncamunca kills Frizaletta "for killing her mamma" But Frizaletta killed the queen for killing her sweetheart Noodle, and the queen killed Noodle because he was the messenger of ill news — Tom Thumb, by Fielding the novelist (1730), altered by O'Hara, author of Alas (1778)

Hunchback (The) Master Walter "the hunchback" was the guardian of Julia, and brought her up in the country, training her most strictly in knowledge and goodness When grown to womanhood, she was introduced to sir Thomas Clifford, and they plighted their troth to each other Then came a change Clifford lost his title and estates, while Julia went to London, became a votary of fashion and pleasure, abandoned Clifford, and promised marriage to Wilford earl of Rochdale The day of espousals came The love of Julia for Clifford revived, and she implored her guardian to break off the obnoxious marriage Master Walter now showed himself to be the earl of Rochdale, and the father of Julia, the marriage with Wilford fell through, and Julia became the wife of sir Thomas Clifford — S Knowles (1831)

* * * Similarly, Maria "the maid of the Oaks" was brought up by Oldworth as his ward, but was in reality his motherless child — J Burgoyne, The Maid of the Oaks

Hunchback (The Little), the buffoon of the sultan of Casgar Supping with a tailor, the little fellow was killed by a bone sticking in his throat The tailor, out of fear, carried the body to the house of a physician, and the physician, stumbling against it, knocked it downstairs Thinking he had killed the man, he let the body down a chimney into the store-room of his neighbour, who was a purveyor The purveyor, supposing it to be a thief, belaboured it soundly, and then, thinking he had killed the little hunchback, carried the body into the street, and set it against a wall A Christian merchant, reeling home, stumbled against the body, and gave it a blow with his fist Just then the patrol came up, and arrested the merchant for murder He was condemned to death, but the purveyor came forward and accused himself of being the real offender The merchant was accordingly released, and the purveyor condemned to death, but then the physician appeared, and said he had killed the man by accident, having knocked him downstairs When the purveyor was released, and the physician led away to execution, the tailor stepped up, and told his tale All were then taken before the sultan, and acquitted, and the sultan ordered the case to be enrolled in the archives of his kingdom amongst the causes célèbres — Arabian Nights ("The Little Hunchback")

Can I view thee panting lying
On thy stomach without sighing
Can I un moved see thee dying
On a log expiring frog!

Say have fiends in shape of boys
With wild halloo and brutal noise
Hunted thee from marshy joys
With a dog expiring frog!

Hurry, servant of Oldworth of Old-worth Oaks He is always out of breath, wholly unable to keep quiet or stand still, and proves the truth of the proverb,
 "The more haste the worse speed" He fancies everything must go wrong if he is not bustling about, and he is a constant fidget—J Burgoyne, The Maid of the Oaks

Poor Weston! "Hurry" was one of his last parts, and was taken from real life I need not tell those who remember this genuine representative of nature, that in "Hurry" he threw the audience into loud fits of mirth without decomposing a muscle of his features (1737-1776).

Hurtali, a giant who reigned in the time of the Flood

The Masorets affirm that Hurtali being too big to get into the ark, sat astride upon it, as children stride a wooden horse—Rabelais, Pantagruel li. 2.

(Minage says that the rabbins assert that it was Og, not Hurtali, who thus outrode the Flood—See Le Pelletier, chap xxv of his Noah's Ark)

Hush'al (2 syl), in Dryden's satire of Abalom and Achitophel, is Hyde earl of Rochester As Hush'al was David's friend and wise counsellor, so was Hyde the friend and wise counsellor of Charles II As the counsel of Hush'al rendered abortive that of Achitophel, and caused the plot of Abalom to miscarry, so the counsel of Hyde rendered abortive that of lord Shaftesbury, and caused the plot of Monmouth to miscarry

Hush'al, the friend of David in distress
 In public storms of manly steadfastness,
 By foreign treaties he informed his youth
 And joined experience to his native truth

Hyacinthe (3 syl), the daughter of seigneur Geronte (2 syl), who passed in Tarentum under the assumed name of Pandolphe (2 syl) When he quitted Tarentum, he left behind him his wife and daughter Hyacinthe Octave (2 syl) son of Argante (2 syl) fell in love with Hyacinthe (supposing her surname to be Pandelophe), and Octave's father wanted him to marry the daughter of his friend seigneur Geronte The young man would not listen to his father, and declared that Hyacinthe, and Hyacinthe alone, should be his wife It was then explained to him that Hyacinthe Pandolphe was the same person as Hyacinthe Geronte, and that the choice of father and son were in exact accord—Molière, Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671)

(In The Cheats of Scapin, Otway's version of this play, Hyacinthe is called "Clara," her father Geronte "Gripe," and Octave is Anglicized into "Octavian")

Hydromel properly means a mixture of honey and water, but Mrs. Browning, in her Drama of Exile, speaks of a "mystic hydromel," which corresponds to the classic nectar or drink of the immortals. This "mystic hydromel" was given to Adam and Eve, and held them "immortal" as long as they lived in Eden, but when they fell it was poured out upon the earth.

[And] now our right hand hath no cup remaining [For] the mystic hydromel is spilt.
E. B. Browning A Drama of Exile (1830)

Hydropsy, personified by Thomson

Hypocrisy is the homage which vice renders to virtue

L'hypercrite est un hommage que le vice rend à la vertu
—Rochefoucauld

Hypocrite (The), Dr. Cantwell in the English comedy by Isaac Bickerstaff and Turtuffio in the French comedy by Molière. He pretends to great sanctity but makes his "religion" a mere tool for getting money, advancing his worldly prospects, and for the better indulgence of his sensual pleasures. Dr. Cantwell made the guest of sir John Lambert (in French, "Orgon"), who looks on him as a saint, and promises him his daughter in marriage, but his mercenary views and his love-making to lady Lambert being at length exposed, sir John forbids to remain in the house, and a tipstaff arrests him for a felonious fraud (1768).

Iachimo [Yal' : mo], an Italian libertine. When Posthumus, the husband of Imogen, was banished for marrying the king's daughter, he went to Rome, and in the house of Philario the conversation fell on the fidelity of wives. Posthumus bet a diamond ring that nothing could change the fidelity of Imogen, and Iachimo accepted the wager. The libertine contrived to get into a chest in Imogen's chamber, made himself master of certain details, and took away with him a bracelet belonging to Imogen. With these vouchers, Iachimo easily persuaded Posthumus that he had won the bet, and Posthumus handed over to him the ring. A battle subsequently ensued, in which Iachimo and other Romans, with Imogen disguised as a page, were made prisoners, and brought before King Cymbeline. Imogen was set free, and told to ask a boon. She asked that Iachimo might be compelled to say how he came by the ring which he had on his finger, and the whole villainy was brought to light. Posthumus was pardoned, and all ended happily.—Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605).

* * The tale of Cymbeline is from the Decameron of Boccaccio (day 11 9), in which Iachimo is called "Ambrose," Imogen is "Zineura," her husband Bernard "Lomellin," and Cymbeline is the "sultan." The assumed name of Imogen is "Fidelê," but in Boccaccio it is "Sieurano da Finale."

Ia'go (2 or 3 syl), ancient of Othello, commander of the Venetian army, and husband of Emilia. Iago hated Othello, both because Cassio (a Florentine) was promoted to the lieutenantcy over his head, and also from a suspicion that the Moor had tampered with his wife, but he concealed his hatred so artfully that Othello felt confident of his "love and honesty." Iago strung together such a mass of circumstantial evidence in proof of Desdemona's love for Cassio, that the Moor killed her out of jealousy. One main argument was that Desdemona had given Cassio the very handkerchief which Othello had given her as a love-gift, but in reality Iago had induced his wife Emilia to purloin the handkerchief. When this villainy was brought to light, Othello stabbed Iago, but his actual death is no incident of the tragedy—Shakespeare, Othello (1611).

The cool malignity of Iago silent in his resentment, subtle in his designs, and studious at once of his interest and his vengeance, are such proofs of Shakespeare's skill in human nature as it would be vain to seek in any modern writer.—Dr Johnson.

* * Byron, speaking of John P. Kemble, says "Was not his 'Iago' perfection—particularly the last look? I was close to him, and I never saw an English countenance half so expressive."

Iambic Verse (The Father of), Archilochos of Paros (B.C. 714-676).

Ianthé (3 syl), in The Siege of Rhodes, by Sir William Drvenant.

Mrs. Betterton was called "Ianthé" by Pepys in his diary as having performed that character to his great approval. The old gossip greatly admired her and praised her sweet voice and incomparable acting.—W. G. Russell, Representative Actors.

Ian'the (3 syl), to whom Lord Byron dedicated his Child Harold, was lady Charlotte Harley, who was only eleven years old at the time (1809).

Iberia's Pilot, Christopher Columbus. Spain is called "Iberia" and the Spaniards the "Iberi." The river Ebro is a corrupt form of the Latin word Iberus.

Il'iad (8 syl), the tale of the siege of Troy, an epic poem in twenty-four books, by Homer. Menelaos, king of Sparta, received as a guest Paris, a son of Priam, king of Troy. Paris eloped with Helen, his host's wife, and Menelaos induced the Greeks to lay siege to Troy, to avenge the perfidy. The siege lasted ten years, when Troy was taken and burnt to the ground. Homer's poem is confined to the last year of the siege.

Book I opens with a pestilence in the Grecian camp, sent by the sun-god to avenge his priest Chrysis. The case is this: Chrysis wished to ransom his daughter, whom Agamemnon, the Greek commander-in-chief, kept as a concubine, but Agamemnon refused to give her up, so the priest prayed to Apollo for vengeance, and the god sent a pestilence. A council being called, Achilles upbraids Agamemnon as the cause of the divine wrath, and Agamemnon replies he will give up the priest's daughter, but shall take instead Achilles's concubine. On hearing this, Achilles declares he will no longer fight for such an extortionate king, and accordingly retires to his tent and sulks there.

II Jupiter, being induced to take the part of Achilles, now sends to Agamemnon a lying dream, which induces him to believe that he shall take the city at once, but in order to see how the soldiers are affected by the retirement of Achilles, the king calls them to a council of war, asks them if it will not be better to give up the siege and return home. He thinks the soldiers will shout "no" with one voice, but they rush to their ships, and would set sail at once if they were not restrained by those privy to the plot.

III The soldiers, being brought back, are then arrayed for battle. Paris proposes to decide the contest by single combat, and Menelaos accepts the challenge. Paris, being overthrown, is carried off by Venus, and Agamemnon demands that the Trojans should give up Troy in fulfilment of the compact.

IV While Agamemnon is speaking, Pandarus draws his bow at Menelaos and wounds him, and the battle becomes general.

V Pandarus, who had violated the truce, is killed by Diomed.

VI Hector, the general of the Trojan allied armies, recommends that the Trojan women in a body should supplicate the gods to pardon the sin of Pandarus, and in the mean time he and Paris make a sally from the city gate.

VII Hector fights with Ajax in single combat, but the combatants are parted by the heralds, who declare it a drawn battle, so they exchange gifts and return to their respective tents.

VIII The Grecian host, being discomfited, retreats, and Hector prepares to assault the enemy's camp.

IX A deputation is sent to Achilles, but the sulky hero remains obdurate.

X A night attack is made on the Trojans by Diomed and Ulysses.

XI And the three Grecian chiefs (Agamemnon, Diomed, and Ulysses) are all wounded.

XII The Trojans force the gates of the Grecian ramparts.

XIII A tremendous battle ensues, in which many on both sides are slain.

XIV While Jupiter is asleep, Neptune interferes in the quarrel in behalf of the Greeks.

XV But Jupiter rebukes him, and Apollo, taking the side of the Trojans, puts the Grecians to a complete rout. The Trojans, exulting in their success, prepare to set fire to the Grecian camp.

XVI In this extremity, Patroclus arrays himself in Achilles's armour, and leads the Myrmidons to the fight, but he is slain by Hector.

XVII Achilles is told of the death of his friend.

XVIII Resolves to return to the battle.

XIX And is reconciled to Agamemnon.

XX A general battle ensues, in which the gods are permitted to take part.

XXI The battle rages with great fury, the slaughter is frightful, but the Trojans, being routed, retreat into their town, and close the gates.

XXII Achilles slays Hector before he is able to enter the gates, and the battle is at an end. Nothing now remains but XXIII To burn the body of Patroclus, and celebrate the funeral games.

XXIV Old Priam, going to the tent of Achilles, craves the body of his son Hector, Achilles gives it up, and the poem concludes with the funeral rites of the Trojan hero.

 Virgil continues the tale from this point. Shows how the city was taken and burnt, and then continues with the adventures of Æneas, who escapes from the burning city, makes his way to Italy, &c.

Iliad in a Nutshell (The) Pliny tells us that the Iliad was once copied in so small a hand that the whole of the twenty-four books were shut up in a nutshell—Ilist, vii 21

Huet, bishop of Avranches, demonstrated the possibility of this being the case by writing eighty lines of the Iliad on the space occupied by one line of this dictionary, so that the whole Iliad might be got into about two-thirds of a single page

In No 530 of the Harleian MSS is an account of a similar performance by Peter Bales, a Chancery clerk in the reign of queen Elizabeth He wrote out, in 1590, the whole Bible, and enclosed his MS in a walnut-shell Bales's MS contained as many leaves as an ordinary Bible, but the size of the leaves was reduced, and the paper was as thin as possible

I have myself seen the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and "God save the King!" all written on a space not larger than a silver threepence, and who has not seen a sheet of the Times newspaper reduced to the size of a locket?

The Iliad in a nutshell is quite outdone by the web given to a prince by the White Cat It was wrapped in a millet seed, and was 400 yards long What was more wonderful was this there were painted on it all sorts of birds, beasts, and fishes, fruits, trees, and plants, rocks and sea-shells, the sun, moon, stars, and planets, the likenesses of all the kings and princes of the world, with their wives, mistresses, and children, all dressed in their proper costume

The prince took out of a box covered with rubies a walnut, which he cracked and saw inside it a small hazel nut, which he cracked also and found inside a kernel of wheat He peeled the kernel, and discovered a corn of wheat, and in the wheat-corn was a grain of millet, which contained a web 400 yards in length.—Comtesse D'Aunoy Fairy Tales (The White Cat, 1632)

Longfellow The Wayside Inn (prelude)

Imogen, daughter of Cymbeline (3 syl) king of Britain, married clandestinely Posthumus Leonātus, and Posthumus, being banished for the offence, retired to Rome. One day, in the house of Philario, the conversation turned on the merits of wives, and Posthumus bet his diamond ring that nothing could tempt the fidelity of Imogen. Iachimo accepted the wager, laid his plans, and after due time induced Posthumus to believe that Imogen had played false, showing, by way of proof, a bracelet, which he affirmed she had given him, so Posthumus handed over to him the ring given him by Imogen at parting. Posthumus now ordered his servant Pisanio to inveigle Imogen to Milford Haven, under pretence of seeing her husband, and to murder her on the road, but Pisanio told Imogen his instructions, advised her to enter the service of Lucius, the Roman general in Britain, as a page, and promised that he would make Posthumus believe that she was dead. This was done, and not long afterwards a battle ensued, in which the Romans were defeated, and Lucius, Iachimo, and Imogen were taken prisoners. Posthumus also took part in the battle, and obtained for his services the royal pardon. The captives being brought before Cymbeline, Lucius entreated the king to liberate Imogen. The petition was not only granted, but Imogen was permitted, at the same time, to ask a boon of the British king. She only begged that Iachimo should inform the court how he came by the ring he was wearing on his finger. The whole villainy was thus revealed, a reconciliation took place, and all ended happily. Imogene (The Fair), the lady betrothed to Alonzo "the Brave," and who said to him, when he went to the wars "If ever I marry another, may thy ghost be present at the bridal feast, and bear me off to the grave." Alonzo fell in battle, Imogene married another, and, at the marriage feast, Alonzo's ghost, claiming the fulfilment of the compact, carried away the bride.—M G Lewis, Alonzo the Brave and the Fair Imogene (1795)

Imogene (The lady), wife of St Aldobrand. Before her marriage, she was courted by count Bertram, but the attachment fell through, because Bertram was outlawed and became the leader of a gang of thieves. It so happened one day that Bertram, being shipwrecked off the coast of Sicily, was conveyed to the castle of lady Imogene, and the old attachment revived on both sides. Bertram murdered St Aldobrand, Imogene, going mad, expired in the arms of Bertram, and Bertram killed himself.—C Maturin, Bertram (1816)

Imoin'da (3 syl), daughter of a white man, who went to the court of Angola, changed his religion, and grew great as commander of the forces. His daughter was married to prince Oroonoko. Soon afterwards the young prince was trapped by captain Driver, taken to Surinam, and sold for a slave. Here he met his young wife, whom the lieutenant-governor wanted to make his mistress, and Oroonoko headed a rising of the slaves. The end of the story is that Imoin'da slew herself, and Oroonoko, having stabbed the lieutenant-governor, put an end to his own life.—Thomas Southern, Oroonoko (1696)

Impertinent (The Curious), an Italian, who, to make trial of his wife's fidelity, persuades his friend to try and seduce her. The friend succeeds in winning the lady's love, and the impertinent curiosity of the husband is punished by the loss of his friend and wife too.—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I. iv. 5 (an episode, 1605)

Impostors (Literary)—

1 BERTRAM (Dr Charles Julius), professor of English at Copenhagen. He gave out that he had discovered, in 1747, in the library of that city, a book entitled De Situ Britannia, by Richardus Cornensis. He published this with two other treatises (one by Gildas Badonicensis, and the other by Nennius Banchoresensis) in 1767. The forgery was exposed by J E Mayor, in his preface to Ricardi de Cirencestris Speculum Historiale.

2 CHATTERTON (Thomas) published, in 1777, a volume of poems, which he professed to be from the pen of Thomas Rowley, a monk of the fifteenth century.

The forgery was exposed by Mason and Grav

3 IRELAND (Samuel William Henry) published, in 1796, a series of papers which he affirmed to be by Shakespeare, together with the tragedy of Lear and a part of Hamlet. Dr Parr, Dr Valpy, James Boswell, Herbert Croft, and Pie the poet-laureate, signed a document certifying their conviction that the collection was genuine, but Ireland subsequently confessed the forgery. He also wrote a play entitled Fortigern and Rowena, which he asserted was by Shakespeare, but Malone exposed the imposition.

4 LAUDER (William) published, in 1751, false quotations from Masenius a Jesuit of Cologne, Taubmann a German, Staphorstius a learned Dutchman, and others, to "prove Milton a gross plagiarist." Dr Douglas demonstrated that the citations were incorrect, and that often several lines had been foisted in to make the parallels. Lauder confessed the fact afterwards (1754).

5 MENTZ, who lived in the ninth century, published fifty-nine decretals, which he ascribed to Isidore of Seville, who died in the sixth century. The object of these letters was either to exalt the papacy, or to enforce some law assuming such exaltation. Among them is the decretal of St Fabian, instituting the rite of the chrism, with the decretals of St Anacletus, St Alexander, St Athanasius, and so on. They have all been proved to be barefaced forgeries.

6 PEREIRA (Colonel), a Portuguese, professed to have discovered in the convent of St Maria de Merinhão, nine books of Sanehon'athon, which he published in 1837. It was found that the paper of the MS bore the water-mark of the Osnabrück paper-mills.

7 PSALMANAZAR (George), who pretended to be a Japanese, published, in 1704, an Historical and Geographical Description of Formosa, an Island belonging to the Empire of Japan. He was an Englishman, born in London, name unknown (died 1763).

8 SMITH (Joseph) professed that his Book of Mormon, published in 1830, was a direct-revelation to him by the angel Mormon, but it was really the work of a Rev Solomon Spalding. Smith was murdered in Carthage jail in 1844.

9 SUTTEES (Robert) sent Sir Walter Scott several ballads, which were inserted in good faith in the Border Minstrelsy, but were in fact forgeries. For example,

The Death of Featherstonhaugh, a ballad said by Surtees to be taken down from the mouth of an old woman on Alston Moor (1806), Lord Ewrie, said to be taken down from the mouth of Rosa Smith of Bishop Middleham, æt 91 (1807), and Barthram's Dirge (1809).

The Korân was said by Mahomet to be revealed to him by the angel Gabriel, but it was in reality the work of a Persian Jew, a Jacobite and a Nestorian. The detached parts of the Korân were collected into a volume by Abû Bekr in 634. Mahomet died in 632.

Improvisators

ACCOLTI (Bernardo), of Arezzo, called the Unico Aretino (1465-1535).

AQUILANO (Scrafino), born at Aquila (1466-1500).

BANDITINI (Teresa), (1763-*) Marone, Quereio, and Silvio ANTONINO (eighteenth century).

BROVICIUS (P J), who could convert extempore into Latin or Greek verse, a Dutch newspaper or anything else which he heard (died 1776).

CORILLA (Maria Maddela), of Pistoia. Mde de Staël has borrowed her Corrinno from this improvisatrix. Crowned at Rome in 1776 (1740-1800).

GIANNI (Francesco), an Italian, made imperial poet by Napoleon, whose victories he celebrated in verse (1759-1822).

JEIRÂN (Nur), of Bengal, during the sultanhip of Jehangher. She was the inventor of the otto of roses (died 1645).

KARSHOF (Anna Louisa), of Germany. MAZZEL (Signora), the most talented of all improvisators.

METASTASIO (P A D B), of Assisi, who developed at the age of ten a wonderful talent for extemporizing in verse (1698-1782).

PERFFETTI (Bernardino), of Sienna, who received a laurel crown in the capitol, an honour conferred only on Petrarch and Tasso (1681-1747).

PETRARCA (Francesco), who introduced the amusement of improvisation (1304-1374).

POSSI, beheaded at Naples in 1799.

SERAFINO D'AQUILA (See above, "Aquilano").

SERIO, beheaded at Naples in 1799.

SGRICCI (Tommaso), of Tuscany (1788-1832). His Death of Charles I, Death of Mary Queen of Scots, and Fall of Missolonghi are very celebrated.

Inchcape Rock (The), east of the Isle of Alas, twelve miles from all land, in the German Sea. Here a warning bell was floated on a buoy by the forethought of an abbot of Aberbrothok. Southey says that Ralph the Perver, in a mischievous joke, cut the bell from the buoy, and it fell into the sea, but on his return voyage his boat ran on the rock, and Ralph was drowned.

In old times upon the middle rock there was a bell fixed upon a timber which sang continually being raised by the sea, giving notice to sailors of the danger. This bell was put there and maintained by the abbot of Aberbrothok but being taken down by a seaman a year or two thereafter he perished on the same rock with ship and goods in the righteous judgement of God.—Scottish Remarks on Scotland

A similar story is told of St Goven's bell, in Pembrokeshire. The silver bell was stolen one night from the chapel by pirates, but no sooner had their boat put out to sea than all the crew were wrecked. The silver bell was carried by sea-monkeys to a well, and whenever the stone of that well is struck the bell is heard to mourn.

Inconstant (The), a comedy by G. Farquhar (1702). "The inconstant" is young Mirabel, who shilly-shallies with Oriana till she saves him from being murdered by four braves in the house of Lamoree (2 syl).

This comedy is a récliffé of the Wild-goose Chase, by Beaumont and Fletcher (1652).

Incorruptible (The). Maximilien Robespierre was so called by his friends in the Revolution (1756-1793).

"William Shuppen," says Horace Walpole, "is the only man proof against a bribe."

Inesilla de Cantarilla, daughter of a Spanish lace-maker. She had the unusual power of charming the male sex during the whole course of her life, which exceeded 75 years. Idolized by the noblemen of the old court, she saw herself adored by those of the new. Even in her old age she had a noble air, an enchanting wit, and graces peculiar to herself suited to her years.—Leage, Old Blas, viii 1 (1735).

Inez of Cadiz, addressed in Child Harold, i (after stanza 84). Nothing known of her.

Inez (Donna), mother of don Juan. She trained her son according to prescribed rules with the strictest propriety, and designed to make him a model of all virtues. Her husband was don Ise, whom she worried to death by her prudery and want of sympathy. Donna Inez was a "blue-stocking," learned in all the sciences, her favourite one being "the mathematical." She knew every European language, "a little Latin and less Greek." In a word, she was "perfect as perfect is," according to the standard of Miss Edgeworth, Mrs. Trimmer, and Hannah More, but had "a great opinion of her own good qualities." Like Tennyson's "Maud," this paragon of women was, to those who did not look too narrowly, "faultily faultless, idly regular, splendidly null."—Byron, Don Juan, i 10-30 (1819).

Inez de Castro, crowned six years after her death. The tale is this: Don Pedro, son of Alfonso IV of Portugal, privately married, in 1315, the "beauty of Castile," and Alfonso was so indignant that he commanded her to be put to death (1355). Ten years afterwards, don Pedro succeeded to the crown, and in 1361 had the body of Inez exhumed and crowned.

Camões, the Portuguese poet, has introduced this story in his Inez de A Lerrera, another Portuguese poet, has a tragedy called Inez de Castro (1553), Lamotte produced a tragedy with the same title (1723), and Guiraud another in 1826. (See next art.)

Inez de Castro, the bride of prince Pedro of Portugal, to whom she was clandestinely married. The king Alfonso and his minister Gonzalez, not knowing of this marriage, arranged a marriage for the young prince with a Spanish princess, and when the prince refused his consent, Gonzalez ferreted out the cause, and induced Inez to drink poison. He then put the young prince under arrest, but as he was being led away, the announcement came that Alfonso was dead and don Pedro was his successor. The tables were now turned, for Pedro was instantly released, and Gonzalez led to execution.—Ross Neil, Inez de Castro or The Bride of Portugal (See previous art.)

At one year old he knew the chief events of the Pentateuch; at thirteen months he knew the history of the Old Testament; at fourteen months he knew the history of the New Testament; at two and a half years he could answer any ordinary question of history or geography; and at three years old he knew German, French, and Latin.

Inferno (The), in thirty-four cantos, by Dantè [Alighieri] (1300). While wandering through a wood (this life), the poet comes to a mountain (fame), and begins to climb it, but first a panther (pleasure), then a lion (ambition), and then a she-wolf (avarice) stand in his path to stay him. The appearance of Virgil (human wisdom), however, encourages him (canto 1), and the Mantuan tells him he is sent by three ladies [Beatrice (faith), Lucia (grace), and Mercè] to conduct him through the realms of hell (canto 2). On they proceed together till they come to a portal bearing this inscription: ALL HOPE ABANDON YE WHO ENTER HERE, they pass through, and come to that neutral realm, where dwell the spirits of those not good enough for heaven nor bad enough for hell, "the praiseless and the blameless dead." Passing through this border-land, they command old Charon to ferry them across the Acheron to Limbo (canto 3), and here they behold the ghosts of the unbaptized, "blameless of sin" but not members of the Christian Church. Homer is here, Horace, Ovid, and Lucan, who enroll Dantè "sixth of the sacred band." On leaving Limbo, our adventurer follows his guide through the seven gates which lead to the inferno, an enormous funnel-shaped pit, divided into stages. The outer, or first "circle," is a vast meadow, in which roam Electra (mother of Dardanus, the founder of Troy), Hector, Æneas, and Julius Cæsar, Camilla and Penthesilea, Latins and Junius Brutus, Læretia, Marcia (Cato's wife), Julia (Pompey's wife), and Cornelia, and here "apart retired," they see Saladin, the rival of Richard the Lion-heart. Linos is here and Orpheus, Aristotle, Socrates, and Plato, Democritus who ascribed creation to blind chance, Diogenes the cynic, Heracles, Empedocles, Anaxagoras, Thales, Dioscorides, and Zeno, Cicero and Seneca, Euclid and Ptolemy, Hippocrates and Galen, Aricea, and Averroës the Arabian translator and commentator of Aristotle (canto 4). From the first stage they descend to the second, where Minos sits in judgment on the ghosts brought before him. He indicates what circle a ghost is to occupy by twisting his tail round his body: two twists signify that the ghost is to be banished to the second circle, three twists, that it is to be consigned to the third circle, and so on. Here, says the poet, "light was silent all," but shrieks and groans and blasphemies were terrible to hear. This circle is the hell of carnal and sinful love, where Dante recognizes Semiramis, Dido, Cleopatra, and Helen, Achilles and Paris, Tristan, the lover of his uncle's wife Isolde, Lancelot, the lover of queen Guinevere, and Francesca, the lover of Paolo her brother-in-law (canto 5). The third circle is a place of deeper woe. Here fall in ceaseless showers, hail, black rain, and sleet; a flaw, the air is cold and dun, and a foul stench rises from the soil. Cerberus keeps watch here, and this part of the inferno is set apart for gluttons, like Ciaccio (2 syl). From this stage the two poets pass on to the "fourth steep ledge," presided over by Pluto (canto 6), a realm which "hems in all the woe of all the universe." Here are gathered the souls of the avaricious, who wasted their talents, and made no right use of their wealth Crossing this region, they come to the "fifth steep," and see the Stygian Lake of ink hue This circle is a huge bog in which "the miry tribe" flounder, and "gulp the muddy lees." It is the abode of those who put no restraint upon their anger (canto vii) Next comes the city of Dis, where the souls of heretics are "interred in vaults" (cantos vii, ix) Here Dant  recognizes Farinata (a leader of the Ghibelline faction), and is informed that the emperor Frederick II and cardinal Ubaldini are amongst the number (canto x) The city of Dis contains the next three circles (canto xi), through which Nessus condemns them, and here they see the Minotaur and the Centaurs, as Chiron who nursed Achilles and Pholus the passionate The first circle of Dis (the sixth) is for those who by force or fraud have done violence to man, as Alexander the Great, Dionysius of Syracuse, Attila, Sextus, and Pirhus (canto xii) The next (the seventh circle) is for those who have done violence to themselves, as suicides, here are the Harpies, and here the souls are transformed to trees (canto xiii) The eighth circle is for the souls of those who have done violence to God, as blasphemers and heretics, it is a hell of burning, where it snows flakes of fire Here is Capaneus (3 syl) (canto xiv), and here Dant  held converse with Brancetto, his old schoolmaster (canto xv) Having reached the confines of the realm of Dis, Ger on carries Dant  into the region of Mal bolg  (4 syl), a horrible hell, containing ten pits or chasms (canto xvi) In the first is Jason, the second is for harlots (canto xvii), in the third is Simon Magus, "who prostituted the things of God for gold," in the fourth, pope Nicholas III (canto xix), in the fifth, the ghosts had their heads "reversed at the neck-bone," and here are Amphiaraus, Tiresias who was first a woman and then a man, Michael Scott the magician, with all witches and diviners (canto xx), in the sixth, Caiaphas and Annas his father-in-law (canto xxii), in the seventh, robbers of churches, as Vanni Fucci, who robbed the sacristy of St James's, in Pistoia, and charged Vanni della Nona with the crime, for which she suffered death (canto xxiii), in the eighth, Ulysses and Diomed, who were punished for the stratagem of the Wooden Horse (cantos xxvi, xxvii), in the ninth, Athomet and Ali, "horribly mangled" (canto xxviii), in the tenth, alchemists (canto xxix), coiners and forgers, Potiphar's wife, Simon the Greek who deluded the Trojans (canto xxx), Nimrod, Ephialtes, and Ant us, with other giants (canto xxxi) Ant us carries the two visitors into the nethermost gulf, where Judas and Lucifer are confined It is a region of thick-ribbed ice, and here they see the frozen river of Cocytus (canto xxxii) The last persons the poet sees are Brutus and Cassius, the murderers of Julius C sar (canto xxxiv) Dant  and his conductor Virgil then make their exit on the "southern hemisphere," where once was Eden, and where the "moon rises when here evening sets" This is done that the poet may visit Purgatory, which is situate in mid-ocean, somewhere near the antipodes of Judea

Ini, Ine, or Ina, king of Wessex, his wife was Ethelburh, both were of the royal line of Cerdic After a grand banquet, king Ini set forth to sojourn in another of his palaces, and his queen privately instructed his steward to "fill the house they quitted with rubbish and offal, to put a sow and litter of pigs in the royal bed, and entirely dismantle the room" When the king and queen had gone about a mile or so, the queen entreated her husband to return to the house they had quitted, and great was his astonishment to behold the change Ethelburh then said, "Behold what vanity of vanities is all earthly greatness! Where now are the good things you saw here but a few hours ago? See how foul a beast occupies the royal bed So will it be with you, unless you leave earthly things for heavenly" So the king abdicated his kingdom, went to Rome, and

Invisibility is obtained by amulets, dress, herbs, rings, and stones

Amulets as the capon-stone called "Alectoria," which rendered those invisible who carried it about their person—Mirror of Stones

Dress as Albric's cloak called "Tarn-happe" (2 syl), which Siegfried got possession of (The Nibelungen Lied), the mantle of Hel Keplein (qv), and Jack the Giant-killer had a cloak of invisibility as well as a cup of knowledge. The helmet of Perseus or Hadès (Greek Fable) and Mambrino's helmet rendered the wearers invisible. The mojos musphonon was a girdle of invisibility (Mrs Centlivre, A Bold Stroke for a Wife)

Herbs as fern seed, mentioned by Shakespeare, and Beaumont and Fletcher

Rings as Gyges's ring, taken from the flanks of a brazen horse. When the stone was turned inwards, the wearer was invisible (Plato). The ring of Otmit king of Lombardy, according to The Heldenbuch, possessed a similar virtue. Reynard's wonderful ring had three colours, one of which (the green) caused the wearer to be invisible (Reynard the Fox, 1498), this was the gem called heliotrope.

Stones as heliotrope, mentioned by Boccaccio in his Decameron (day viii 3). It is of a green hue. Solinus attributes this power to the herb heliotrope. "Herba ejusdem nominis eum, a quo eumque gestabitur, subtrahit visibus obviatorum"—Geog, vi

Ion, the title and hero of a tragedy by T. N. Talfourd (1835). The oracle of Delphi had declared that the pestilence which raged in Argos was sent by way of punishment for the murder of the race of Argos, and that the vengeance of the gods could be averted only by the extermination of the guilty race. Ion, the son of the king, offered himself a willing sacrifice, and as he was dying, Iru entered and announced that "the pestilence was abating."

Io'na, an island of Scotland south of Staffa, noted for its Culdee institutions, established by St. Columba in 563. It is now called "Icolm-kill," and in Macbeth, act ii. sc. 4, "Colmes-kill" (kull means "burying-ground").

Iphigenia, daughter of Agamemnon king of Argos. Agamemnon vowed to offer up to Artemis the best possession that came into his hands during the ensuing twelve months. This happened to be an infant daughter, to whom he gave the name of Iphigenia, but he forbore to fulfil his vow. When he went on his voyage to Troy, the fleet was wind-bound at Aulis, and Kalchas the priest said it was because Agamemnon had not earned out his vow, so Iphigenia, then in the pride of womanhood, was bound to the altar. Artemis, being satisfied, carried the maiden off to Tauris where she became a priestess, and substituted a hind in her place.

For parallel instances, such as Abraham and Isaac, Jephthah and his daughter, Idomeneus and his son, etc., see IDOMENEUS.

Iphis, the woman who was changed to a man. The tale is this: Iphis was the daughter of Lygdamis and Telethusa of Crete. Lygdamis gave orders that if the child about to be born was a girl, it was to be put to death. It happened to be a girl, but the mother, to save it, brought it up as a boy. In due time, the father betrothed Iphis to Ianthe, and the mother, in terror, prayed to Isis for help. Her prayer was heard, for Isis changed Iphis into a man on the day of espousals. — Ovid, Metaph. ix. 12, vii. 699.

* * Ceneus [St. nece] was born of the female sex, but Neptune changed her into a man. Enceus found her in hades changed back again.

Tiresias, the Theban prophet, was converted into a girl for striking two serpents, and married. He afterwards recovered his sex, and declared that the pleasures of a woman were tenfold greater than those of a man.

Irás, a female attendant on Cleopatra. When Cleopatra had arrayed herself with robe and crown, prior to applying the asp, she said to her two female attendants, "Come, take the last warmth of my lips. Farewell, kind Charman! Irás, farewell!" And having kissed them, Irás fell down dead, either broken-hearted, or else because she had already applied an asp to her arm, as Charman did a little later. — Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra (1608), and Dryden, All for Love.

Shakespeare 2 Henry VI act v sc. 2 (1591)

Iris and the Dying One of the duties of Iris was to cut off a lock of hair (claimed by Proserpine) from those devoted to death, and till this was done, Death refused to accept the victim. Thus, when Dido mounted the funeral pile, she lingered in suffering till Iris was sent by Juno to cut off a lock of her hair as an offering to the black queen, but immediately this was done her spirit left the body. Than'atos did the same office to Alcestis when she gave her life for that of her husband. Irish Widow (The), a farce by Garriek (1757) Martha Brady, a blooming young widow of 23, is in love with William Whittle, the nephew of old Thomas Whittle, a man 63 years of age. It so happens that William cannot touch his property without his uncle's consent, so the lovers scheme together to obtain it. The widow pretends to be in love with the old man, who proposes to her and is accepted, but she now comes out in a new character, as a loud, vulgar, rollicking, extravagant low Irishwoman. Old Whittle is thoroughly frightened, and not only gets his nephew to take the lady off his hands, but gives him £5000 for doing so

Irol'do, the friend of Prasildo of Babylon. Prasildo falls in love with Tisb'na, his friend's wife, and, to escape infamy, Irol'do and Tisb'na take "poison." Prasildo, hearing from the apothecary that the supposed poison is innocuous, goes and tells them so, whereupon Iroldo is so struck with his friend's generosity, that he quits Babylon, leaving Tisbura to Prasildo. Subsequently Iroldo's life is in peril, and Prasildo saves his friend at the hazard of his own life—Bojardo, Orlando Innamorato (1495)

Irolit'a, a princess in love with prince Parcinius, her cousin. The fury Dan'emo wanted Parcinius to marry her daughter Az'ira, and therefore used all her endearments to marry Irolita to Brutus, but all her plans were thwarted, for Parcinius married Irolita, and Brutus married Az'ira

The beauty of Irolita was worthy the world's admiration. She was about 14 years old. Her hair was brown, her complexion blooming as the spring, her mouth delicate, her teeth white and even, her smile bewitching, her eyes a hazel colour and very piercing, and her looks were darts of love.—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales (Perfect Love 162-)

Iron Chest (The), a drama by G. Colman, based on W. Godwin's novel of Caleb Williams. Sir Edward Mortimer kept in an iron chest certain documents relating to a murder for which he had been tried and honourably acquitted. His secretary Wilford, out of curiosity, was prying into this box, when sir Edward entered and threatened to shoot him, but on reflection he spared the young man's life, told him all about the murder, and swore him to secrecy. Wilford, unable to endure the watchful and suspicious eye of his master, ran away, but sir Edward dogged him like a bloodhound, and at length accused him of robbery. The charge could not be substantiated, so Wilford was acquitted. Sir Edward confessed himself a murderer, and died (1796)

Iron Mask (The Man in the). This mysterious man went by the name of Lesang, but who he was is as much in obscurity as the author of the Lettere di Junius. The most general opinion is that he was count F'ceolo Antonio Mattheoli, a senator of Mantua and private agent of Ferdinand Charles duke of Mantua, and that his long imprisonment of twenty-four years was for having deceived Louis XIV in a secret treaty for the purchase of the fortress of Casale. M. Loiseau utterly denies this solution of the mystery.—See Temple Bar, 182-4, May, 1872

* * The tragedies of Æschylus in German (1795), and L'ourmeric in French, are based on the supposition that the man in the mask was marshal Bénédict, a twin-brother of the Grand Monarque, and this is the solution given by the abbé Soult

Ironsides (Sir), called "The Red Knight of the Red Lands." Sir Gareth, after fighting with him from dawn to dewy eve, subdued him. Tennyson calls him Death, and says that Gareth won the victory with a single stroke. Isabella (The lady), a beautiful young girl, who accompanied her father on a chase. Her step-mother requested her to return, and tell the cook to prepare the milk-white doe for dinner. Lady Isabella did as she was told, and the cook replied, "Thou art the doe that I must dress." The scullion-boy exclaimed "O save the lady's life, and make thy pies of me." But the cook heeded him not. When the lord returned and asked for his daughter the scullion-boy made answer, "If my lord would see his daughter let him cut the pasty before him." The father, horrified at the whole affair, advised the step-mother to be burnt alive, and the cook to stand in boiling lead, but the scullion-boy made his hair—Perce, Riquet in 2

Isabelle, sister of Leocadia, an orphan brought up by Sganarelle according to his own notions of the best way to make him a good wife. She was to dress in serge, to keep to the house, to occupy herself in domestic affairs to sew, knit, and look after the house to hear no flattery attend no places of public amusement never to be left to her own devices but to run in harness like a mill-horse. The result was that she duped Sganarelle and married Valer.—(See L'ÉTOILE)—Molière, L'École des Maris (1651)

Isabinda, daughter of sir Isidore Traffick a merchant. Her father is resolved she shall marry don Diego Bonifacio, but she is in love with Charles Gripe and chooses in the dress of a Spaniard, passing herself off as the

Spanish don, marries her—Mrs Centlivre, The Busy Body (1709)

Isenbras (Sir), a hero of mediæval romance. Sir Isenbras was at first proud and presumptuous, but adversity made him humble and penitent. In this stage he carried two children of a poor wood-cutter across a ford on his horse.

* * Millais has taken Sir Isenbras carrying the children across the ferry, as the subject of one of his pictures.

I warn you first at the beginning
That I will make no vain carping [prate]
Of Octorlano and Isenbras

I'sengrin (Sir) or SIR ISENGRIN, the wolf, afterwards created earl of Pitwood, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox. Sir I'sengrin typifies the barons, and Reynard the Church. The gist of the tale is to show how Reynard over-reaches his uncle Wolf (1498).

Ishah, the name of Eve before the Fall, so called because she was taken out of ish, i.e. "man" (Gen ii 23), but after the expulsion from paradise Adam called his wife Eve or Havah, i.e. "the mother of all living" (Gen iii 20).

Ishban, meant for Sir Robert Clayton. There is no such name in the Bible as Ishban, but Tate speaks of "extorting Ishban" pursued by "bankrupt heirs." He says he had occupied himself long in cheating, but then undertook to "reform the state."

Ishban of conscience sulted to his trade
As good a saint as usurer e'er made
Could David scandalize our peerage with his name
Hod e'en turn loyal to be made a peer

Tate, Abalom and Achitophel II. (1652)

Ish'bosheth, in Dryden's satire of Abalom and Achitophel, is meant for Richard Cromwell, whose father Oliver is called "Saul." As Ish'bosheth was the only surviving son of Saul, so Richard was the only surviving son of Cromwell. As Ish'bosheth was accepted king on the death of his father by all except the tribe of Judah, so Richard was acknowledged "protector" by all except the royalists. As Ish'bosheth reigned only a few months, so Richard, after a few months, retired into private life.

They who when Saul was dead without a blow Made foolish Ish'bosheth the crown forego
Dryden Abalom and Achitophel I. (1631)

Ish'monie (3 syl), the petrified city in Upper Egypt, full of inhabitants all turned to stone—Perry, View of the Le-

* * Captain Marryatt has borrowed this idea in his Pacha of Many Tales.

I'sidore (3 syl), a Greek slave, the concubine of don Pèdre a Sicilian nobleman. This slave is beloved by Adraste (2 syl) a French gentleman, who plots to allure her away. He first gets introduced as a portrait-painter, and reveals his love. Isidore listens with pleasure, and promises to elope with him. He then sends his slave Zaïde to complain to don Pèdre of ill-treatment, and to crave protection. Don Pèdre promises to stand her friend, and at this moment Adraste appears and demands that she be given up to the punishment she deserves. Pèdre intercedes, Adraste seems to relent, and the Sicilian calls to the young slave to appear. Instead of Zaïde, Isidore comes forth in Zaïde's veil. "There," says Pèdre, "I have arranged everything. Take her, and use her well." "I will do so," says the Frenchman, and leads off the Greek slave—Molière, Le Sicilien ou L'Amour Pèdre (1667).

Isis, the moon. The sun is Osiris—Egyptian Mythology.

They [the priests] wore rich mitres shaped like the moon
To show that Isis doth the moon portend
Like as Osiris signifies the sun

Spenser Fairy Queen v 7 (1590)

Iskander Beg=Alexander the Great. George Castriot (1414-1467) (See SKANDERBEG).

Iskander with the Two Horns, Alexander the Great.

This Friday is the 18th day of the moon of Safar. In the year 653 [i.e. of the hegira or A.D. 1255] since the retreat of the great prophet from Mecca to Medina and in the year 730 of the epoch of the great Iskander with the two horns.—Arabian Nights (The Tailor's Story).

Island of the Seven Cities, a kind of Dixie's land, where seven bishops, who quitted Spain during the dominion of the Moors, founded seven cities. The legend says that many have visited the island, but no one has ever quitted it.

Islands of the Blest, called by the Greeks "Happy Islands," and by the Latins "Fortunate Islands," imaginary islands somewhere in the West, where the favourites of the gods are conveyed at death, and dwell in everlasting joy.
